CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

SIXTIETH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

matter of truth, the land does not contain gypsum in sufficient quantities to sustain the mining claim, and it is the truth that up to this time a holding of the so-called "mining claim" until the first well was sunk and oil discovered has been largely by the power of the shotgun; and there is litigation untold in California until the first well is down and oil discovered.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman what is the distinctive difference between this law and the other law?

Mr. SMITH of California. I will explain it. This law requires the person who desires to enter the land to go to the land office and make the best showing he can that he thinks the land contains mineral oil, and thereupon he pays 25 cents an acre and enters it much as you would a desert-land entry, and he then has three years in which to demonstrate that it contains oil.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then how much does he pay to the Government?

Mr. SMITH of California. He then pays the same price he would for a mineral claim, $5 an acre. This bill also requires him to expend an amount equal to 50 cents an acre each year in the development of oil. Of course, as a matter of truth, in the development of oil, in three years he will have expended—well, all the way from $5,000 to $30,000 in getting down his well, for the wells cost that much in the oil country in California.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact under the placer law at the present time a man secures only 20 acres?

Mr. SMITH of California. The practice in California has been to take eight claims and locate 160 acres as one claim and then locate the same names again and again and again, so that a man with a reasonable supply of relatives can take their names and locate the whole face of the earth.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is, then, really practicing a fraud, is it not?

Mr. SMITH of California. No; it is not a fraud. It is entirely within the law.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is legalized, perhaps, because it has been done so long as to become a habit.

Mr. SMITH of California. There is no limitation in the law to prevent it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Why does not the man take it under his own name instead of using the names of his kinsfolk or his family?

Mr. SMITH of California. The law does not allow him to enter but one 20-acre piece, but the law does allow eight names to join in the entry of 160 acres.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. On this 20 acres does he not have to do $100 worth of work each year in order to hold that, and at the end of five years, having done five years of work and put out an outlay of $500, is he then not entitled to have the land patented to him?

Mr. SMITH of California. He can have it patented any time before five years.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes; but does he not have to expend $500 on the claim?

Mr. SMITH of California. In thirty days, if he wants to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Under this bill, as I understand it—the old bill—you would have to pay $500 to get 20 acres. Under this bill you would take 160 acres of land, eight times as much, and you are not required to do any work. Is not that correct?

Mr. SMITH of California. You are required to prove that you have discovered oil in commercial quantities. In every case I have known in California it will cost you from $5,000 up to drill a well.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Suppose a man finds an oil seep or spring somewhere on the claim. That is often the case.

Mr. SMITH of California. I have never heard of one in California.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. You do often find asphalt outcropping in canyons and gulches, do you not?

Mr. SMITH of California. This bill does not give him an asphalt vein.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It gives him 160 acres of asphalt land, though.

Mr. SMITH of California. It does not give him the right to enter the asphalt as a ledge.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I understand that. The difference is this, as I understand it: Under the old law you would have to do $500 worth of work on 20 acres. Under this law you are not required to do $500 worth of work or any other work on 160 acres, eight times as much as under the other or old law.

Mr. SMITH of California. You are required to produce a well, which will cost from $5,000 up, and under the present law you can get your patent without discovering the oil if you can show you have got enough gypsum or anything of that kind to bear a title. Then you have your oil underneath if it be oil land. As a matter of truth they do not prove up on the gypsum generally, but sink the first well and prove up on it by showing they have oil land.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Under the law you are now proposing you repeal practically all the old law. Under the old law you would have to sink a shaft 10 feet deep on each 20 acres each year and do your work on each separate tract of 20 acres of land.

Mr. SMITH of California. No, sir.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Unless you run 160 acres together, which you say the practice is to do, so as to evade the law, as I understand the present law.

Mr. SMITH of California. And which they always do.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It evidently was not the intention of the framers of the old law that they could do so; but if they do that now they have to do $500 worth of work on each 20 acres, making $4,000 worth of work to hold the 160 acres of land and get a patent.

Mr. SMITH of California. There is no necessity of discussing it from the standpoint of 20-acre claims, because they never take it that way. My home is in the very heart of the oil district. I have watched that development since 1899, and I have never known a man to take 20 acres. They invariably take eight names and locate a quarter section.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There is in this proposed law a chance for a combination of capital which places much more land (160 acres instead of 20 acres) in the hands of one man, and thus take that many chances away from the people at large.

Mr. SMITH of California. With the exception that in my bill a man can take but one claim of 160 acres, whereas under the present law he can, with seven others, locate as many thousand acres as he chooses and hold it all.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Under this law one man gets as much oil and asphalt lands as eight men do under the old law.

Mr. SMITH of California. But he can do it only once.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is correct; but the old law required him to spend $100 in one year on each 20 acres, and he must develop by work the 20 acres that he can take under the present mineral laws.

Mr. SMITH of California. He was not obliged to go to the depth of oil in the 20 acres. If he located it on the gypsum seams, he proved up whenever he pleased.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will permit me, the gentleman from Texas will recollect that while 20 acres constitute a mineral claim under the law, eight persons can join and locate 160 acres, and when they shall have done this, this 160 acres becomes one claim and that claim is 160 acres; so, as regards that feature, I will say to the gentleman the only change between this law and the present law as regards the requirement of assessment work is that the present law requires an assessment work practically of a dollar an acre, while this is 80 cents. There is no difference, however, in regard to that feature of the present practice under the placer law.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. But this law would give to a claimant 160 acres instead of 20 acres, and while they could not get it directly, you say that they get it indirectly, that is by using other names or dummies with their own.

Mr. SMITH of California. In a way indirectly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Under the other they must do $500 worth of work on each claim, and under this law they would not pay out more than $100, if you find oil, without expending more money the first year.

Mr. SMITH of California. Let me explain, as suggested by the gentleman from Alaska, and also by the gentleman from Wyoming. If you take a consolidated claim of 160 acres, then you have but one piece of assessment work, and $100 covers the whole. So there is no difference between the present law and the bill that you ask about.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. There is, however, this, that you can take one place and develop it and the other has eight places.

Mr. SMITH of California. It is not the law and it is not the rule of the Department that assessment work must be done on each of the 20 acres, because, as stated by two or three of us, if you unite eight claims as one it takes eight names to make the claim. Then it is considered as one claim on the assessment basis, and is controlled as one.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The present law requires a man when he takes a claim of 20 acres to do $100 worth of work on it the first year and do it on that 20 acres, and then after he does that in the first assessment then the seven other persons can combine all the claims there by agreeing to do $500 worth of work the next year on the 160 acres, and by doing it anywhere on the 160-acre tract; but they must do their first assessment work.

Mr. SMITH of California. If you enter it as a 20-acre claim in your name and a neighbor 20 acres and another 20 acres, you may not consolidate them into one, because you have to do $100 worth of work on each, but if you take eight names and post them on the monument and call it 160, then it is regarded as one claim, and you have to do but one piece of assessment work—$100 worth—making one discovery on the 160 acres.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. You must do your first assessment, and then you consolidate after?

Mr. SMITH of California. No; you do not. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before the gentleman sits down, I understood him to say a moment ago that you can not enter asphaltum ledges under this bill?

Mr. SMITH of California. I think you can not enter an asphaltum ledge.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is there in this bill that forbids it, because I notice this in section 2.

He has to file a declaration of intention under oath with the register of the land district that he intends to claim and improve, or cause to be improved, for the oil or asphaltum thereon.

Mr. SMITH of California. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, a lake is "thereon," of course.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The first section provides for that, too.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Farther down it says:

Such land to be chiefly valuable for its deposits of mineral oil or asphaltum.

If it is in a lake, it is a deposit.

That he intends to make or cause to be made a bona fide effort to produce oil or asphaltum on said land in paying quantities.

Then I notice later on in the proviso to section 3:

Provided, however, That any declarant who discovers any vein or lode bearing asphaltum, gilsonite, elaterite, or other like substances within the limits of the land included in his declaration or entry——

Mr. SMITH of California. He may then enter that.

Mr. WILLIAMS (reading)—

under this act shall have the preferential right for a period of ninety days after discovery of such vein or lode within which to locate same under the provisions of the general mining laws of the United States.

By the language before that it is spoken of as "deposit," and in one case it speaks of it as "asphaltum thereon."

Mr. SMITH of California. I want to explain that to the gentleman. The oil that is produced in California is nearly all of it of a very heavy kind, used only for fuel, and the base is asphaltum, and it gradually becomes heavier and heavier in different localities, until you can not tell whether it is oil or liquid asphalt. Therefore I used both terms running through the bill, so that there might be no controversy as to whether you found an asphalt well or an oil well, and a provision was put in as you suggest, and that was done at the suggestion of the Land Department, that if you found a ledge of it—that is, hard asphalt, solidified asphalt—why then you might enter that as a separate mining claim, but it does not pass with the original entry.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Tell me, because I am ignorant upon the subject, what sort of asphalt is found in these lakes of asphalt?

Mr. SMITH of California. We do not have any lakes of asphalt. We find the mineral oil in California in every instance in a sort of quicksand, which is impregnated with the oil.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A lake of asphalt; is that solidified asphalt or is it liquid asphalt?

Mr. SMITH of California. We have no lakes of asphalt in California.

Mr. MONDELL. There are none in the United States.

Mr. SMITH of California. In order to find a lake of asphalt you would have to go to Trinidad.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why should the word "asphaltum" be used in the bill at all, as it is in every section following the word "oil?" It is only limited, if it be limited at all, by this proviso:

That any declarant who discovers any vein or lode bearing asphaltum, * * * shall have the preferential right for the period of ninety days after discovery of such vein or lode within which to locate same under the provisions of the general mining laws.

But the limitation seems only to apply to a lode bearing asphaltum.

Mr. SMITH of California. For the reason——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, I know nothing about it, but does a lode bearing asphaltum invariably bear solid asphaltum and not liquid?

Mr. SMITH of California. Yes; if it is liquid it will not be found in a lode; it will permeate the earth, it will spread out and be found in the pores of the sand in the earth.

Mr. MONDELL. The same as oil.

Mr. SMITH of California. The same as oil. I use the word because we have controversies as to whether a man has an oil well or an asphalt well. The substances come nearly together, as the volatile oils have disappeared in the process of nature and left the residuum. It may still be in liquid form, or semiplastic form, and you would hardly know whether to call it oil or asphaltum.

Mr. WILLIAMS. One other question. I ask you this question because I am rather of the opinion that we ought not to have a patched coat of land laws in the United States—one set of laws for one State and another for another—unless you are going to give the lands to a particular State. If this be a good law for California, why is not it equally a good law for all the public domain?

Mr. SMITH of California. I will explain that. I drew the bill and made it applicable to all the public lands of the United States, and I should like to explain the manner in which I came to draw the bill.

I was visited last year by a committee from the Chamber of Mines of Los Angeles and asked if I would assist them in preparing legislation on which they could found a claim that would justify the very heavy expense necessary in drilling the first wells on new territory. I collaborated with them, and we produced a bill.

We submitted it to the press of California by circular draft of the bill; it was criticised, and we accepted the amendments offered, as we did criticisms and amendments from every direction in the State. Then we submitted it to the Interior Department and they gave further amendments, and we embodied them in this draft of the bill, and then the committee amended it.

The representatives of the public-land States other than California, while they generally agreed that this might be good legislation, as one gentleman remarked, "We will try it on the dog"—we will try it on California was what they meant, but not meaning any disrespect to the State of California. They said, "We will try it on California, and if it works satisfactorily to those willing to make this large expenditure it can be applied to other States hereafter." My idea was to have it apply to other States because gentlemen from California want to go into Utah and other States and make tests for oil. I stood stubbornly by it, but yielded to the Members of the Western States, who said that they would not like to have it apply to their States until they saw how it worked out in California.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought what had happened was what frequently happens in such cases as these, that a Member introduces a bill, general in its application, and members of the committee are not willing to vote for it, and then he states that he will confine it to his own constituency or locality, and they vote for it because it does not affect their constituency and they do not care.

Mr. SMITH of California. I do not think that that is a proper criticism of this bill. Mr. Speaker, I will yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California some moments ago reserved the balance of his time, but debate has been going on and his time is nearly consumed.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I will yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming and three minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from California a question.

Mr. SMITH of California. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I want some information in regard to a sentence in the bill. In section 3 it provides "that at any time within three years from the filing of the claim aforesaid the claimant or his successor in interest may apply for a patent," and then it further provides that a corporation may be the successor in interest. What I want to know is if it would be possible for two or more individuals to file claims adjacent to each other for 160 acres each and then, by organizing separate corporations, to take over these interests and control a large tract of land?

Mr. SMITH of California. It provides in the bill that an oil claim may be held by a corporation. It has been our experience that there is no other way to develop the land except by this cooperative method, by forming corporations, selling to all the women, children, and neighbors some stock. It is a cooperative proposition and you can not develop oil in any other way, and therefore it seemed to be necessary for it to go to a corporation. It is provided in the bill that a corporation can prove up on only one claim; it can not take a number of claims and mass them into one holding.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Could not some of these organizations control two or more corporations?

Mr. SMITH of California. Yes; that can always be done.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, this bill modifies the present oil-land laws in two important particulars. In the first place, it limits the amount of oil land which can be acquired by an individual. That is an important amendment to the present law, under which there is practically no limitation on the acreage which an individual can locate. On the other hand, while it limits the amount that an individual may acquire, it gives the individual a security in his oil-land holding that he does not have under the present law; so that the two changes, it is believed, balance each other, the one restrictive in the amount of land that can be taken and the other giving the oil entryman a security which he does not now have.

Now, briefly answering the question of the gentleman from Mississippi, a very pertinent inquiry, as to why we did not apply the law generally to the public lands of the country, I will say that in my opinion we would have done much better in our public-land legislation in the past had our legislation, or a considerable portion of it, been passed to fit the conditions of given localities. One difficulty with our public-land laws in the past has been that we have attempted to cover a region from Mexico to Canada and from the Pacific Ocean to the Mississippi Valley with the same law; arid and semiarid territory, mountain and plain, with infinitely diversified conditions, with the result that many laws that have worked well in one locality have not worked well elsewhere.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the gentleman mean to say that he does not think this bill would work elsewhere than in California?

Mr. MONDELL. I will not say that; I think it may work best there. I will come to that in a moment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask the gentleman with a view of obtaining this answer, why is it? What are the local conditions that make it applicable there and not applicable elsewhere?

Mr. MONDELL. I was coming to the gentleman's question, and I shall preface my answer by the general statement that the application of the same land laws to all creation has resulted in this: That men have differed widely in their views as to the wisdom of land laws by reason of the fact that a law that works well in one locality does not always work well in another locality. So that one viewing the law working well in his locality finds it difficult to understand why those of another State or a locality, having different conditions, object to the law on the ground that it is not working well in their locality.

For some time, for a number of years past, it has been apparent that we, perhaps, ought to have some modification of the laws applying to the acquisition of oil lands, but it has been exceedingly difficult to hit upon any solution of the difficulties confronting the oil operator that people throughout the oil regions of the West as a whole would accept or approve. My opinion is that the gentleman from California [Mr. SMITH] has outlined what is, in some important respects, a very excellent plan, but, in my opinion, it is a plan which will work better in a fairly well-developed oil region than in a new and undeveloped region. In my opinion, it might not work well; it might hamper development in a region where the occurrence of paying oil deposits has not been definitely determined.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I understood the gentleman to yield me ten minutes. Have ten minutes elapsed?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yielded the gentleman only five minutes. I will yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman this question. I see on page 2, lines 9 and 10, this language:

> In no case shall a claim be more than 1 mile in length.

Now, suppose these parties unite eight claims; would it be possible or not under this bill to have a claim 8 miles in length, let us say?

Mr. MONDELL. Under this bill there can be no such thing as uniting claims.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is that forbidden anywhere in the bill?

Mr. MONDELL. There is a provision under which an individual can take but one claim in a county.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, that is all they ever could do.

Mr. MONDELL. Under the placer act there is no limit to the number of claims an individual may locate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understood the gentleman from California a moment ago to state that they could unite eight claims.

Mr. MONDELL. I would say that under the placer-mining laws of the United States a claim is 20 acres of land, and under the law eight mining claims can be united into one.

Mr. WILLIAMS. By one man?

Mr. MONDELL. No; by securing the names of seven associates; and a common practice is, after location is made by an association of eight, to have seven of the parties immediately assign to one man. However, this seeming liberality of the placer-mining laws afford little security to the oil locator, because the validity of a mining claim depends upon a discovery, and in most cases the oil claimant can not make a discovery until after expensive drilling, if at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is the question I want to ask the gentleman. Is it possible under this law—and if it is not possible, what provision of this bill prevents it—for one person to enter 160 acres and then to procure seven other persons, each to enter 160 acres, and transfer to the first entryman? If that is anywhere forbidden by the act, why and how is it forbidden?

Mr. SMITH of California. The bill expressly provides that no one shall be a party to but one final proof of 160 acres.

Mr. MONDELL. And the bill also provides that only one entry can be made by an individual, although an individual can abandon the entry at any time, and then make another filing. This law does restrict the area, but at the same time it gives an additional security, and, like all new legislation covering public lands, it is and must be admitted to be somewhat experimental in character; but it is hoped that, taking into consideration its restrictive character as to original locations on the one hand and the fact that it does give a more definite title on the other, it may prove an improvement over the present law, and it applies to the State of California only because the conditions there are believed to be those best suited to the operation of a law of this kind, and so it is proposed to try it on California, as its provisions seem to be approved there.

This bill is quite a marked departure in some respects, not only from our present oil-land law, but from most of our past land legislation. For instance, it gives the locator unquestioned control of the land covered by his entry for the purposes contemplated by the bill for the period of three years against all comers; and, again, it allows assignments freely, while restricting original locations. These features are more or less experimental, and while the Department of the Interior approved them, the fact that they present new questions in the disposition of our public lands containing oil had its influence in prompting the committee to confine the operations of the law to California. If it works well, it can be extended; if it does not, it can be amended, and in that event only land in California will have been subject to its provisions.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS].

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS].

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from California [Mr. SMITH] or the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] some questions. On page 4, lines 14 and 15, I find this language, commencing on line 12:

> Provided, That if there are any veins or lodes or quartz or other rocks in place-bearing gold, silver, cinnabar, lead, tin, copper, or other valuable deposits known to exist at date of filing such application for patent, the title thereto shall not pass under any application, entry, or patent under the provisions of this act.

Now, under this provision it seems to me very plain that a man could take 160 acres of lodes, containing gold, silver, cinnabar, lead, or copper and also placers, or anything else that he did not know existed at the time he made his filing and I would suggest this amendment: Strike out in lines 14 and 15 the words "known to exist at date of filing such application for patent." Then it would be impossible that veins or lodes or quartz or other rock in place-bearing gold, silver, cinnabar, lead, tin, copper, nor other valuable deposits, could pass to a man who is taking it up under this law simply for oil or asphaltum.

Mr. SMITH of California. It has been the policy of the United States in every kind of patent to convey whatever is in the ground. If you take up a homestead, you would get a gold mine if it is in there and you did not know it when you got the patent. Of course, when you make final proof in a homestead entry you are making a nonmineral proof that at the time you did not know any gold was there; but if you afterwards found a gold mine on a homestead claim, it would be yours. So I think there should be no segregation of a gold mine for patent——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I do not think it ought to pass at all in this House without striking out the words "known to exist at date of filing such application for patent."

Mr. SMITH of California. I should——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I do not think the discovery of a placer or lode claim of copper, lead, gold, silver, or cinnabar should be secured—as provided in this bill—for, by its provisions, you might lock up a vast amount of fine mineral territory unknown at the time it was taken up, and I do not think that it would be just to do so. The homestead settler can not do that when he takes it up for agricultural purposes—

Mr. SMITH of California. He takes whatever is in the ground.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. But he has to make proof that it is not mineral-bearing land at the time he obtains patent.

Mr. SMITH of California. And so it is under this.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I do not so understand it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, the homestead illustration just used by the gentleman from California I do not think will pass muster, because the first section of this bill reads:

That public lands of the United States in the State of California, chiefly valuable for mineral oil or asphaltum, may be acquired under the provisions of this act.

And the entire bill is based upon the idea of allowing mineral lands, or what otherwise would have been considered as mineral lands, to be entered for the purpose of securing oil and asphaltum. Now, Mr. Speaker, this bill and the explanations that have been given of it by two of the brightest men in the House, and the mental condition in which the House is left as to what the bill really means, notwithstanding their explanations, is an illustration of the weakness and folly of attempting to pass bills of this sort with twenty minutes' debate on a side and no opportunity for the House to amend. There was no chance of hearing the bill when it was read to the House because of the disorder, there were no bills to be procured until the bill at the desk had been more than half read, and none of us could get acquainted with the legislation in that way. Now, this bill would require a long enough time in any satisfactory explanation of it for gentlemen to explain just how it connects itself with the present mineral-land law, showing just precisely what provisions of existing law are modified, repealed, or varied by it. There has been no chance for that.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am still of the opinion, notwithstanding the plausible and perhaps sensible statement of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] that we ought not to have crazy-quilt public-land legislation. Unless a real good reason can be given for treating same kind of lands differently the same laws ought to apply. By that, of course, I do not mean that swamp lands should be treated like desert lands, or either should be treated like arable lands, or either of all three should be treated like mineral lands, or mineral lands be treated like oil lands, but I do mean that oil lands everywhere should be governed by a law, and not twenty laws, or two laws, or three laws, and that arable lands for homestead settlement should be governed by a law everywhere, and so forth.

Now, I find on page 2 the language which I read a moment ago.

In no case shall a claim be more than 1 mile in length.

The gentleman from California [Mr. SMITH] tells me that the language on page 4, reading—

No individual or corporation shall be a party to final proof proceedings under this act on more than one claim—is a restriction on the practice now prevailing for 20-acre tracts of adding seven new tracts to the original entry. But the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] explained that the manner in which that is done under existing law is by some one individual first entering a 20 acres and then seven other individuals of an association each entering a 20 acres and finally transferring to the first.

Mr. SMITH of California. The gentleman is mistaken about that. That is not the practice. That is not the way in which you get them consolidated.

Mr. CALE. It is not the law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is not the law I know, but what is the practice?

Mr. SMITH of California. The practice is to take the eight names and write them all on the same notice of location and post it on the claim and thereby claim 160 acres.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Following that, if I am to take the statement made a moment ago by Mr. MONDELL, the practice is, after that, for the other seven parties to transfer to the one party the claim they have obtained. Now, then, that being the case, why is it not possible under this bill, if it become a law, for eight individuals in an "association" to each enter 160 acres and have seven to transfer or assign—each one of the seven—his 160 acres to some one of the eight? Now, if that could happen, there might be a strip 8 miles long contained in what would have become one claim, and of the breadth necessary to make it 1 mile long for each 160 acres, which would be a quarter, I believe. Now, how does the gentleman——

Mr. SMITH of California. I mean by this that one would have no object in taking those, because he can not patent them, and he can hold it but three years without applying for a patent. Therefore a man is not going to buy up the claims of his neighbors when he must fail to get anywhere with them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. You mean he can not finally patent?

Mr. SMITH of California. No; he can not.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The point, then, is in the language "final proof proceedings?"

Mr. SMITH of California. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to vote for this bill if I thought it understood, but when one is——

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Does not the gentleman think this bill, having been worked out in the Department and favorably recommended by the committee, that fact ought to have great weight, and is not this a bill that we would usually pass by unanimous consent?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, if I legislated here upon the theory of doing whatever a Department recommended, I think I would be falling far short of my duty, and I am satisfied that the gentleman from California [Mr. NEEDHAM] would feel that he was falling far short of his if he legislated in the same manner. Why, I know gentlemen here—even on that side—who will not even legislate as the President wants them to, although he is the head of all the Departments.

Section 4 of this bill, I call it to the attention of the gentleman from California, reads, on page 5:

That upon receiving and filing an application for patent—such notice shall be given and such proceedings had as are required for final proof on a mineral entry. If the final proofs are satisfactory, patent shall be issued upon payment to the receiver of the sum of $5 per acre.

Now, it would appear that either the language to which I previously referred, as quoted by the gentleman himself, being on lines 10, 11, and 12, on page 4, and upon which he relied for his statement of the intendment or meaning of the law—either does not mean what the gentleman has construed it to mean, or else, being so construed, that standing upon an equal footing, according to a familiar principle of the law, and being construed together with section 4, it is modified in its meaning or repealed by section 4, or else that the two, taken together, mean nothing at all—that is to say, are, in the light of one another, incapable of construction.

Mr. SMITH of California. I want to explain. Section 4 refers to the notice that must be posted and printed; refers to the nature of the proof that must be furnished at the time patent is sought.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But it says "for final proof," and "shall be the same as for final proof on mineral lands," and goes on further and says "if the final proofs are satisfactory, patents shall be issued."

Mr. SMITH of California. The proof that it refers to is the notice that must be published in a newspaper and that must be posted.

The SPEAKER. The time has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Notwithstanding that, the phrase "final proof" evidently means just what it says. I do not think I can vote for a bill that I can not understand after the debate which the rule allows.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Pending that, I move that the House do now take a recess until 11.30 to-morrow morning.

The question was taken.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 128, nays 82, answered "present" 12, not voting 165, as follows:

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 22, 1908.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD E. HALE.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. SCOTT, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

FINDINGS OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate communications from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting certified copies of the findings of fact filed by the court in the following causes:

In the cause of John A. Norris v. United States; and

In the cause of George H. Bellamy, administrator of the estate of John H. Thees, deceased, v. United States.

The foregoing findings were, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 17506. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenues," approved June 10, 1890, as amended by the act entitled "An act to provide revenues for the Government and to encourage the industries of the United States," approved July 24, 1897; and

H. R. 19541. An act to authorize the drainage of certain lands in the State of Minnesota.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 1424) to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented memorials of the Local Union of Sandy Hill, and Local Union No. 4, of Palmer, of the International Brotherhood of Pulp, Sulphite, and Paper Mill Workers, in the State of New York; of Local Union No. 30, International Brotherhood of Pulp, Sulphite, and Paper Mill Workers, of Berlin, N. He also presented a petition of the Arlington Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Providence, R. I., and a petition of the Anna Gordon Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of East Providence, R. I., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia, which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. BRANDEGEE presented a petition of the Scientific Association of Middletown, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the preservation of the national forests and other natural resources, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. du PONT presented resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of citizens of Wilmington, Del., and signed by J. E. McClintock, chairman, and A. R. Saylor, secretary, praying for the adoption of certain amendments to the so-called "Sherman antitrust law," relating to labor organizations, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BROWN presented a petition of sundry teachers and students of the Home Economics Department of the University of Nebraska, of Lincoln, Nebr., praying for the enactment of legislation to regulate the employment of child labor in the District of Columbia, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HOPKINS presented petitions of Local Union No. 182, International Molders' Union, of Belleville; of Local Union No. 90, of Danville; of the Local Union of East St. Louis; of the Local Union of Chicago, all of the American Federation of Labor, and of local branches, Glass Bottle Blowers' Association, of Alton, all in the State of Illinois, praying for the adoption of certain amendments to the so-called "Sherman antitrust law," relating to labor organizations, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GORE presented a memorial of the legislature of the State of Oklahoma, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

Whereas the segregated coal and asphalt commission, provided for by resolution of the constitutional convention of the State of Oklahoma, have submitted their report to the governor and the legislature of the State of Oklahoma; and

Whereas the report shows that there are about 444,000 acres of land in the Chickasaw and Choctaw nations in the State of Oklahoma that are segregated from the lands of said nations and are not subject to sale, lease, or settlement; and

Whereas this land is situated almost entirely in Coal, Pittsburg, Latimer, Le Flore, and Haskell counties, and as long as it is held as it is it is nontaxable, making it very difficult for the counties to maintain their county organization; and

Whereas it is desired by the people of the State of Oklahoma to further investigate the extent and the value of the coal and asphalt deposits on said lands with a view of purchasing the same provided the same can be lawfully done; and

Whereas it is the desire of the said Chickasaw and Choctaw nations to have the surface of said lands and the coal and asphalt deposits sold to one purchaser; and

Whereas the best interests of the State of Oklahoma demand that the State own the said segregated lands provided the same can be purchased at a reasonable and fair price: Now, therefore be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the Congress of the United States be, and are hereby, requested to enact the necessary legislation permitting the State to enter into negotiations with the said nations and with the proper officers of the Government of the United States looking to the purchase of the said lands by the State of Oklahoma and that full and complete authority be conferred upon the said nations and the proper officers of the United States to complete and carry out the sale of said lands to the State.

J. C. GRAHAM,
President pro tempore of the Senate.
WILLIAM H. MURRAY,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

O. H. PITTMAN, Chief Clerk.

INDIAN ALLOTMENTS.

Mr. CURTIS. I present the memorial of S. M. Brosius, agent of the Indian Rights' Association, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation authorizing the issuance of fee-simple patents for Indian allotments and subjecting them to taxation as a punishment to drunkards and to Indian parents who refuse to permit their children to attend school. I move that it be printed as a document.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. McCUMBER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 16268) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 554) thereon.

Mr. LODGE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported an amendment proposing to appropriate $375 to pay the Government of Sweden for the proportionate share of the United States on account of a claim of a Swedish subject in Samoa under the convention of November 7, 1899, between the United States, Great Britain, and Germany, intended to be proposed to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, and moved that it be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, which was agreed to.

Mr. BOURNE, from the Committee on Fisheries, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6460) to establish a shad hatchery on the Kennebec River, in the State of Maine, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 555) thereon.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 15852) to confer title in fee and to authorize the disposition of certain lots now situate on Hot Springs Reservation, in the State of Arkansas, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 556) thereon.

MONUMENT TO GEN. WILLIAM CAMPBELL.

Mr. DANIEL. From the Committee on the Library, I report back favorably with amendments the bill (S. 5295) for the erection of a monument to the memory of Gen. William Campbell, and I submit a report (No. 557) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 12, after the word "time," to strike out "and inscribe thereon their names as" and insert "A suitable inscription shall be made thereon, under the direction of the Secretary of War, to the memory of Gen. William Campbell and;" in line 14, after the word "and," to strike out "practically resulted in" and insert "largely contributed to;" and on page 2, line 1, after the name "Lord Cornwallis," to insert "at Yorktown," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be erected in the town of Abingdon, Va., a statue to the memory of Gen. William Campbell and comrades; and for the purpose of procuring and erecting said statue, with a suitable pedestal, and for the preparation of a site, the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War or such officer as he may designate and in such sums as the work may require from time to time. A suitable inscription shall be made thereon, under the direction of the Secretary of War, to the memory of Gen. William Campbell and the heroes of the battle of Kings Mountain, which destroyed one wing of the British army and largely contributed to the defeat and surrender of Lord Cornwallis at Yorktown; and the Secretary of War, or authorized agent, is empowered to select a site for the statue authorized by this act on ground belonging to the Government.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. NIXON introduced a bill (S. 6783) to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Nevada, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Fisheries.

Mr. BEVERIDGE introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 79) authorizing the widening of the channel of Michigan City Harbor, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. CURTIS submitted an amendment providing that hereafter the collector of customs for the district of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, in lieu of fees he is now receiving, shall be paid the same salary that collectors of customs at other points are paid under the act of June 22, 1874, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURKETT submitted an amendment providing that the Brightwood Railway Company shall, after November 1, 1908, run its cars in connection with the Washington Railway and Electric Company through Ninth street to the Center Market from the point on Brightwood avenue opposite the Walter Reed Army General Hospital at intervals of not less than six minutes, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO THE OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. DICK submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to House bill 15372, known as the "omnibus claims bill," which were ordered to be printed and, with the accompanying papers, ordered to lie on the table.

AMENDMENT TO OMNIBUS PUBLIC-BUILDINGS BILL.

Mr. NELSON submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for the United States post-office, court-house, custom-house, and site at Duluth, Minn., from $125,000 to $220,000, intended to be proposed by him to the omnibus public-buildings bill, which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and ordered to be printed.

SEAL ISLANDS IN ALASKA.

On motion of Mr. HEYBURN, it was Ordered, That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be allowed to take from the files of the Senate the original copy of Senate Document No. 376, Sixtieth Congress, first session, the same being the files copy of the Department.

PROVIDENCE WASHINGTON INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. WETMORE. I submit a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to require the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to examine and report to the Senate the amount twice paid by the Providence Washington Insurance Company, of Providence, R. I., as taxes on the same identical income or profits under the acts of Congress approved July 1, 1862; June 30, 1864, and July 14, 1870, and amendments thereto.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. CULBERSON. I have no objection to the present consideration of the resolution, but I notice that it assumes the facts in the case, except as to the amount. Of course if the Senator from Rhode Island can assure us that the fact of the double payment is not disputed, I will not suggest an amendment. I call his attention to the form of the resolution, in which it assumes that double payment has been made upon the identical property rather than asks for the facts of the case as to whether there has been a double payment of taxes on the same property.

Mr. WETMORE. The resolution is drawn in the exact language of previous resolutions for the same purpose. I have one here, for instance, adopted in 1903, that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] submitted.

Mr. CULBERSON. Relating to this same company?

Mr. WETMORE. No; to another company. The resolution simply follows the language of previous resolutions for the same general purpose.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will ask the Senator if there is any question about a double payment having been made?

Mr. WETMORE. I understand there is none, but the Commissioner of Internal Revenue will report as to that. In case there has not been, he will report that it is not so. The amount involved is a very small one, I think four or five hundred dollars altogether. I am perfectly willing to have the resolution lie over so that the Senator can look into the matter, if he would prefer that course.

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not care to have the resolution go over; but the Senator does not seem to be able to state positively that a double payment was made. He says he understands so.

Mr. WETMORE. I have here a sworn statement that such is the case, if the Senator would like to examine it.

Mr. CULBERSON. In view of the statement of the Senator from Rhode Island, as I presume we can get the real facts, although I do not yet believe that the resolution is in proper form, I do not object to its present consideration.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 17506. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenues," approved June 10, 1890, as amended by the act entitled "An act to provide revenues for the Government and to encourage the industries of the United States," approved July 24, 1897, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

H. R. 19541. An act to authorize the drainage of certain lands in the State of Minnesota, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

COMPANIES B, C, AND D, TWENTY-FIFTH INFANTRY.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays Senate bill 6206 before the Senate.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 6206) for the relief of certain former members of the Twenty-fifth Regiment of the United States Infantry.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President, yesterday on the close of my remarks, I had stated that certain of the Americans of Brownsville objected to the coming of the colored troops and that the Mexicans of that city did not object, in fact affiliated with the colored people as with their own race. The testimony of many witnesses was introduced in which an expression of the feeling of opposition to the coming of the colored troops was given. That I remarked in the introduction only for one purpose, and that is to show a motive upon the part of the citizens for attacking the soldiers, but it could not be for the purpose of showing a motive for one class of the citizens to attack another class of the citizens.

Some of the Americans who were opposed to the coming of the negro troops expressed their disapproval in vigorous and unjustifiable language. Captain Kilburn, of the Twenty-sixth Infantry, the battalion which was relieved by the three companies of the Twenty-fifth Infantry, testified that some time in May, 1906, after it was known that the negro troops had been ordered to Fort Brown, he heard a Mr. Tillman, in his place of business in Brownsville—and remember, Mr. Tillman's place was the place in which the barkeeper, Frank Natus, was killed—in the presence of several persons, say:

We will run the negro troops out of town in three weeks, and have the white troops back.

I am inclined to the opinion that this officer drew largely upon his imagination in this statement, for on the 11th day of September, 1906, some seven months before giving this testimony before the committee, he made an affidavit for the Constitutional League, in which the conversation with Mr. Tillman is given in these words:

On one occasion in particular, Mr. Tillman, a citizen of Brownsville, * * * in a conversation with me expressed his doubt about the advisability of sending colored troops to Brownsville.

Captain Kilburn's exaggeration of the language of Mr. Tillman may be accounted for by his low estimate of the people of Brownsville, he having testified that there were not in that city more than 12 or 14 families "who had some of the natural innate refinement of ladies and gentlemen." This I submit is rather a severe indictment against a town of from six to eight thousand inhabitants; but, from facts before the committee, Captain Kilburn's social standing while stationed at Brownsville was not such as to qualify him as a judge to pass upon "the natural innate refinement of ladies and gentlemen." Lieutenant Thompson, of the same regiment with Captain Kilburn, testified that after it was learned that the battalion of the Twenty-fifth Infantry was to garrison Brownsville he heard citizens make many derogatory remarks with reference to the colored soldiers, such as:

We don't want the damn niggers here; niggers will always make trouble; to hell with the colored soldiers; we want white men.

Sergeant Huron, of Company M, Twenty-sixth Infantry, testified that after the order was promulgated that the colored troops were to come to Brownsville he heard a Mr. Weller say that—

He did not want these colored soldiers to come there; that no one in Brownsville wanted them to come there, and that he did not think they would stay there very long when they did come. People will not stand for them being here; they will not have them, or something like that. That was the meaning of his words; I am not positive of the exact words.

Huron added:

That the people did not say how they would get rid of the negro troops.

This witness further testified that—

Victorianna Fernandez, a policeman of Brownsville, said to him in the presence of other parties: "I see, sergeant, they are going to send those negro soldiers down here," and I told him they were. He tapped his pistol that he carried on his side, saying, "I want to kill a couple of them when they get here," and that this remark the policeman repeated to him.

When asked if he paid much attention to the remark of Fernandez, he replied:

No, sir; I thought it was more of brag at the time; that he regarded it as "idle talk." Those of the committee who saw Fernandez I think came to the conclusion that he was as harmless and inoffensive an individual as ever swung a policeman's "billy."

Corpl. John E. Kimmel, a company cook, of the Twenty-sixth Infantry, testified that he heard a saloon keeper by the name of Weller, in speaking of the coming of the colored troops, say:

Well, I don't think they will be here very long.

He did not indicate how they would get rid of them; and that about the same time a Mr. Moore, who ran the Miller Hotel in Brownsville, at the company kitchen, in the presence and hearing of Private Fisher in talking about the change of troops at Fort Brown, said he did not like a nigger anyway, and that they would not be very long getting rid of them.

In answer to the question—

But your idea was they were going to try to get them removed through their influence in Washington?

he replied:

My idea was that they very likely intended to put in a petition to have this done; that was my idea.

The Private Fisher referred to by Corporal Kimmel corroborates the statement as to the remarks attributed to Mr. Moore. Private Fisher had served a term in the penitentiary under sentence of a general court-martial on the charge of desertion.

A Mr. Otis C. West, private in the Twenty-sixth Infantry, testified that shortly after the arrival of the colored troops at Fort Brown a Mexican boy, between 10 and 12 years of age, asked him for a ride. When driving out of the fort this youthful desperado got in the wagon; he noticed that he had in his hat cartridges, and between him and the boy the following occurred:

Q. Did you have any conversation with him?—A. Nothing more than I said, "Kid, what are you going to do with those?" and he kind of looked up at me and grinned and said, "I am going to take them down town to sell them to kill niggers with." I thought nothing of it then.

Q. How old would you judge he was?—A. I should judge he was 10 or 12 years old, perhaps.

* * * * * * *

Q. You heard no hostile remarks made at all?—A. No more than what I have mentioned, sir.

Q. This little boy of 10 or 12?—A. He made nothing more than he just made that expression and kind of grinned at me. Whether he meant it or not I don't know.

Q. He did not look very vicious when he made the remark?—A. No.

Q. He just laughed and said he was going to sell them to kill niggers?—A. That is all. I thought nothing of it.

Q. Did it strike you as very singular that this little boy should have so many cartridges?—A. Not at all. That is a common thing, to see them have them.

This trifling instance serves to illustrate the industry employed in running down every expression of citizens of Brownsville that could in any way be tortured into a threat against the colored troops.

There will be found in the evidence other expressions voicing the opposition of a portion of the people of Brownsville to the coming of the colored troops, but in most of the cases the impression left upon the witnesses who heard the remarks was that the negro troops were to be gotten away from Brownsville through the influence of Senators and Representatives; this, and nothing more.

It is undoubtedly true that the soldiers were subjected to indignities—indignities that naturally created a spirit of resentment, if not of retaliation. In one instance, Adair, a negro soldier, returning from Matamoras, had in his possession a penholder which he had bought there. An overzealous custom-house inspector took the penholder from the negro with the remark that he did not intend to let "a damn nigger smuggle." Again, a soldier by the name of Reed, on his return from Matamoras, being (as the evidence would indicate) intoxicated, was pushed by one Baker, an inspector of customs, from the gang plank of the ferryboat into the water and mud.

Lieutenant Thompson, in his affidavit to which I have referred, says he was informed by Teofilo Crixell, a saloon keeper in Brownsville, that when one Bates, a custom-house official, was at the bar drinking in the White Elephant saloon, a colored soldier entered and asked for a drink, whereupon Bates turned upon him saying, "No nigger could drink at the same bar with him," and upon the soldier remarking that he was as good as any white man, Bates drew his revolver and hit the soldier over the head.

Another soldier by the name of Newton was struck over the head with a revolver by a Mr. Tate, also an inspector of customs, because, as Tate claims, Newton jostled rudely against his wife, who was standing on the sidewalk with some other ladies. In my judgment Tate's assault upon this soldier was drastic and unjustifiable.

Upon the arrival of the colored troops in Brownsville an order went out among all the saloons which were American that no negroes should be permitted to drink at the same bar with white customers. In some of the saloons they were not permitted to enter at all, while in others they were given a separate bar in the rear of the saloon, which could be reached by a back door from the alley. This treatment was resented by the soldiers, and even those of them who did not frequent saloons necessarily resented the race prejudice which insisted on such exclusion and restrictions.

Jacob Frazier, first sergeant of Company D, and a man of intelligence, after testifying that he believed that citizens of Brownsville shot up the town, said:

Q. What made you think that the citizens of Brownsville had such an antipathy for the soldiers of Companies B, C, and D as to shoot up the town?—A. I will tell you.

Q. That is what I want to know?—A. Before they were ordered there, there were white soldiers there; they got all their money—that is, them that is supposed to want to go to these saloons to spend their money; they got the biggest part of their money. Well, when we got down there the men found out after we got down there that they were not allowed to go to their bars and drink; that is, in front; well, they would not go at all if they could not go in front. Now they were not going to get their money. There was one man there that was discharged out of Company B; he started up a saloon on the outside of the post; we were paid off on Saturday and they all go to this colored saloon.

Q. That would be Saturday, the 11th?—A. Yes; they all go there: you could not find a man in the rest of the saloons. They were not getting any of their money. It took four or five men to wait on the customers in this colored saloon, and they just looked at it this way: Well, now, we had white soldiers here and we got their money; these colored soldiers, we are not going to get it and the best thing we can do is to get them away. We will get white soldiers here. We will get white soldiers here and then our town will go on just as it has been. That is my belief (p. 79).

Q. Do you know of any other reason that occurs to you why the citizens of Brownsville would shoot up their own town except in order to get rid of the colored troops so as to make more trade at the bar rooms of the town?—A. No, I don't know any other reason. I have stated my reasons thoroughly, just what my belief is; and that is what I believe (pp. 79–80).

* * * * * * *

Q. Certainly I am just getting your belief, Mr. Frazier. Now, Companies B, C, and D were paid off on Saturday?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. The 9th I believe that was?

Senator FORAKER: The 11th.

Q. The 11th, I mean; and you say this colored man who had been discharged, who had opened a saloon, was doing such a rushing business that it took four or five barkeepers to wait on his customers?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. To wait upon the members of Companies B, C, and D, who went in there?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And that continued on Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, did it?—A. On Saturday and Sunday, and on Monday of course there were not quite so many there, but still—— (p. 79).

The saloon referred to by Sergeant Frazier was opened by one Allison, a discharged soldier of the colored battalion. This saloon was located on Garrison road some four or five blocks east of the main entrance of the fort, and its pernicious influence, in my judgment, was largely responsible for the shooting up of the town of Brownsville.

The indignities to which the colored soldiers were subjected in Brownsville were, as might naturally be expected, a matter of common barracks talk. To contend that the negro soldiers did not feel resentful at the treatment to which they had been subjected would be to contend that they were less than human, and I have no disposition to minimize the feelings of opposition to the coming of the colored troops by the citizens of Brownsville, nor to attempt to justify their treatment of them. These indignities, however, it must be remembered, save that of excluding the soldiers from the saloons, were all offered by custom-house officers, not one of them being the act of a private citizen of Brownsville or of a member of the police force of that city.

The most serious of the occurrences previous to the night of August 13 was the assault upon a Mrs. Evans, a resident of Brownsville, who, upon returning from the station to her home, said she was pulled from her horse to the ground by a colored man in the khaki uniform of a soldier, and that upon her giving an outcry the man ran away. Some time during the day of the 13th of August the husband of Mrs. Evans, with the mayor, Doctor Combe, visited Major Penrose and made to him complaint of this attack. This assault was on August 12, and was published in the Brownsville newspapers of the next day, thus coming generally to the attention of the population of the city. It was also known among the troops. The conversation between Major Penrose, the mayor, and Mr. Evans was overheard by a man by the name of Voshelle, a teamster, and the interview was witnessed by Elmer Brown, an enlisted man.

By reason of the Evans assault Major Penrose issued an order that no enlisted men should be out of the reservation after 8 o'clock; prior to that time they were permitted to be out until check roll call, which was 11 o'clock.

It was known to the soldiers that the Evans incident was the cause of the issuance of the order requiring all men to be in the fort by 8 o'clock.

Corporal Wheeler asked Captain Macklin, the officer of the day, the cause for the issuance of the order and received the reply:

People are trying, it seems like, to give us some trouble; a lady has reported that she was insulted, that she was troubled by some of the soldiers, but we do not believe anything of the kind. (Mess. p. 244.)

This language on the part of the officer was calculated to inflame rather than allay the feeling of resentment on the part of the rank and file. Sergt. Maj. Spottswood W. Taliaferro, testified that while he was sitting at the supper table Sergeant Wheeler came in and said:

All passes have been cut off and the men are all ordered to be in barracks by 8 o'clock, and none allowed to leave after that hour. He said: "It is reported that some soldier frightened a white lady on a horse down town" and the people are very angry, and there is likely to be trouble," and I said "I haven't heard anything of this; where did you get your authority for that?" And he said "Captain Macklin was here a short while ago and told me these things."

The witness also testified that—

The mail orderly who came into the fort about 8 o'clock, upon being asked if everything was quiet in town said: "There was a crowd around the post office that tried to engage me in a conversation concerning the newspaper reports of the assault on Mrs. Evans" and he said that he told them he didn't know anything about it, and tried to get rid of them as best he could, and they seemed to want trouble, and finally just as he was leaving one of them said to him, "It's a good thing that your commanding officer has ordered you all in tonight," and he said, "some of you were going to get killed," to which the mail orderly replied: "He didn't guess they would do anything and he guessed the killing would not be all on one side." (P. 1497.)

This threatening language, if the evidence is to be believed, was not reported to any commissioned officer of the battalion.

In view of these instances there is not the slightest doubt, however much individual witnesses may deny it, that the whole command was on edge and was incensed at the people of Brownsville for the indignities which they had put upon the troops and felt a resentment growing out of an outraged sense of justice.

Major Penrose, the day after the occurrence, said:

That the enlisted men have been subjected to indignities since their arrival here, there can be no doubt, and this has caused a good deal of feeling among them. (Mess. p. 32.)

And in speaking of the assault on Newton and the Evans case, he says:

These two instances have served to cause bad blood between the citizens and the soldiers. (Mess. p. 33).

After a thorough examination of the evidence I am convinced that the attitude of the Brownsville people toward the colored troops was unjust and that the feeling of deep resentment against the citizens which the soldiers had was but natural, yet such resentment, however just, could furnish no excuse for the attack which was made by soldiers, but the record of troops at other army posts in the south and west, whether the troops were white or colored, shows such an outbreak and shooting up of a town to be a method of revenge that naturally suggests itself to men who have arms at hand and have been trained in their use.

It is a fact that no sooner had the order been issued that the colored soldiers of the Twenty-fifth Infantry were to be sent to Brownsville, than it was known that the citizens of that city objected to their coming; but the War Department decided, and properly, I think, that questions of local sentiment ought not to influence the disposition of the troops, and accordingly Companies B, C, and D, were ordered from Fort Niobara, where they had been stationed for many months, to Fort Brown. While on their way to Texas an order was issued that they should take part in maneuvers with the National Guard of Texas, at Camp Mabry, near Austin. The order elicited a protest from the commanding officer, Colonel Hoyt, and the other officers of the regiment, on the ground that there was great danger of a collision between the Texas National Guard and the Twenty-fifth Infantry, the State troops in previous maneuvers having charged that some of the colored soldiers had used ball cartridges during the maneuvers and on that account refused to drill with colored troops.

This protest of Colonel Hoyt led to a change of the order by the War Department and the troops were ordered directly from Fort Niobrara to Fort Brown. That this change of order was known to the members of the colored battalion there can be no doubt, and it led them to believe that their reception at Fort Brown would not be of a friendly character. This was shown by remarks made by soldiers to the conductor of the train that conveyed the battalion from a place called Sinton to Brownsville, a distance of about 162 miles. The conductor of the train, a Mr. Lunkenheimer, a Pennsylvanian, testified that soldiers engaged him in conversation, making certain references to women which were of a character not even to be printed in the RECORD, much less to be mentioned on the floor of the Senate. In the course of this conversation the soldiers said:

"Any colored there?" I said, "No, I didn't think there was a half dozen families in the town." He said, "Christ, ain't there any saloons there?" I says, "Oh, yes; saloons galore." He says, "Any colored saloons?" I says, "No; if there is I don't know it, but I have got some boys working for me that drink there." * * * He says, "Well, we don't care whether there is any of them or not; we will drink in any of these damn bars; we will do like we did in so and so [mentioning the place they were from]." (P. 3171.)

More of this same character of conversation was testified to by this witness.

It is true that Samuel Wheeler and Winter Washington, soldiers of the battalion, testified that they occupied the car named by the conductor and talked with him, but they heard no such conversation. This was the only attempt made to contradict the evidence of Mr. Lunkenheimer.

Israel Harris, first sergeant of Company D, and a man of intelligence, in his testimony gave evidence of the feeling of the men of the command regarding their assignment to Fort Brown, after testifying to difficulties that had occurred between the colored troops and citizens while in Texas in previous years. His testimony reads:

Q. So when your companies went down in Texas you knew of this feeling when you were ordered down to Fort Brown?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you hear any discussion, Mr. Harris, that you did not expect to stay there long?—A. No, sir; I didn't hear any discussion; the only discussion that I heard in regard to the matter at all was the different men, and I myself said, as soon as my time was out I would leave there; I would reenlist for some other place; I did not like to go down in there.
Q. You would leave there? Why?—A. I didn't care to reenlist to serve down in that section of the country.
Q. Why?—A. Because the people down there seemingly had no use for the soldiers.
Q. Unfriendly?—A. Yes, sir; they were very unfriendly toward the soldiers, and that is why I didn't want to stay there.
Q. And therefore there would be a feeling between the soldiers and citizens?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. You realized that when you went there?—A. Yes, sir. (P. 42, vol. 1.)

That the negro soldiers strongly resented the treatment they received, there is abundant evidence. Wm. Forster, a discharged soldier who had served in the Army nine years, leaving it with an honorable record and with the rank of sergeant, testified to hearing a Mr. Voshelle, a white man, the corral boss, give expression to very violent language regarding the citizens of Brownsville. This conversation came up in relation to the striking of Private Newton by Custom-House Officer Tate, of which I have spoken. I submit a portion of his testimony:

Q. Were you in Brownsville on the 13th of August, at the time of what we term "the shooting up of Brownsville?"—A. I was at Fort Brown, sir.
Q. What were you doing there then?—A. I was living at Fort Brown as a teamster.
Q. You were a teamster in the quartermaster's corral?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. In the employ of the Government?—A. Yes, sir.
* * * * * * *
Q. Who was the corral boss?—A. A man by the name of Voshelle.
Q. What was his given name?—A. I don't know, sir.
Q. Voshelle, the corral boss?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. You heard the Tate incident spoken of, did you not?—A. Yes, sir; I heard of it.
Q. Did you have any talk with Mr. Voshelle, or did he make any remarks about it?—A. I heard him say the morning after that incident that he hoped the niggers would go down there and shoot the town up; he cursed and swore, and so forth.
Q. Did you hear any other talk of Mr. Voshelle?—A. Yes, sir; I heard him in Tillman's saloon make a remark.
Q. What was that and when?—A. I believe it was the next day; I think it was about the 7th.
Q. The next day after what?—A. I think it was about the 7th of the month.
Q. Of August?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. What did you hear him say then?—A. Mr. Adams asked him how the niggers were behaving; he said they were behaving all right now, but just wait until pay day and they will come out here and shoot this damn town up. (P. 2656.)

Another discharged soldier, William Henry Adams, who had served through the Spanish-American war in the Second United States Infantry, corroborates the testimony of Sergeant Forster as to the conversation in Tillman's saloon. This witness was in the employ of an ice company and among other customers that he served was Allison, the discharged colored soldier who kept the saloon on Garrison road. While in Allison's place of business a day or two after the affray he said, in a conversation regarding the shooting:

Why, what was the matter with these fellows?

To which Allison replied:

Oh, the Lord knows; I guess they were having a little spree shooting up the town. (P. 2672.)

A Mr. Walter Billingsley, engaged in the dairy business at Brownsville, testified that when in Mr. Crixell's saloon in that city on the morning of the 13th of August, when Captains Lyon and Macklin were there, the following conversation occurred between himself and the proprietor.

I have stated that as being on the morning of the 13th. Possibly that is an error. It may have been on the afternoon of the 13th. Therefore I make the sugestion now. But here is the conversation that he had with Mr. Crixell. He asked him:

Q. Have you heard anything more about the Evans affair?

And he (Crixell) says:

"Nothing in particular," and I says, "What do these officers say about it," and he says, "Nothing particular," and I say, "Have they done anything or do they act like they are going to do anything in regard to the matter," and he says, "I don't think they will do anything," and I says, "Well, there ought to be something done someway." I says, "At the rate these fellows are carrying on here I don't think the soldiers or officers either ought to be allowed in town if they don't do something to help or assist us or to stop these men from conducting themselves the way they are acting in the city." Then I turned around and walked out. That is all I said to him. (Pp. 2475–2476.)

In giving his narration of that conversation, Crixell testified that Captain Macklin, after Mr. Billingsley had left the saloon, said:

Yes, these niggers will surprise this fellow yet. (P. 2485.)

Mr. Crixell's saloon was one in which neither the white nor the black soldiers were welcome. It was the one saloon in the town of Brownsville that the commissioned officers patronized. Mr. Crixell testified as to a further conversation with Captain Macklin, as follows:

Q. Now, returning to the Tate incident, you know Captain Macklin?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did he patronize your place?—A. Yes, sir; from the first day he got into the town.
Q. Did you see him in your house after the Tate incident when that matter was being spoken of?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. What did he say there, if anything, as to the result, the probable result, of such conduct by the citizens, as that of Mr. Tate, in striking the colored soldier and knocking him down with a pistol?—A. On the 13th, between 2 and 4 o'clock in the afternoon, Captain Macklin and Captain Lyon and Lieutenant Lawrason came into the saloon and they asked me to serve them three gin fizzes, and while I was mixing up the drinks, he asked me, he says, "Joe, have you ever heard anything about a nigger being hit over the head with a six-shooter around here lately?" I said, "Yes, I heard a little about it." He said, "Have you heard the particulars about it?" I said the only thing I heard was that Mr. Tate, this customs officer, hit a nigger over the head with a six-shooter because the nigger would not give the sidewalk to some ladies.
Senator FORAKER. Speak a little louder.
A. (Continuing.) I told them that I had heard about the nigger being hit over the head with a six-shooter, and he asked me if I had heard any of the particulars, and I told him that I had heard that Mr. Tate had hit the nigger over the head with a six-shooter because the nigger had pushed his wife, or some other lady that was with him, off the sidewalk or something like it. Captain Macklin told me then, he says, "Yes, that is what they claim; but," he says, "Major Penrose and myself have investigated this thing thoroughly, and we have found out that these negro soldiers have been imposed on by the citizens and Federal officers of this town," he says, "and this thing has got to be stopped." He says, "Now, Joe, suppose these niggers would jump that barracks fence and shoot this damn town up any of these nights." He says, "We could not prevent it." (Pp. 2484–5.)

It is true that the officers mentioned as being present at that time denied that such a conversation took place, yet there is no intimation to be found in the evidence that Mr. Crixell is not a truthful and reliable man, and it is difficult to imagine why he should attempt to manufacture a story of this kind out of whole cloth, but I submit the conversation as given in the evidence, leaving it to the Senate to determine the question of veracity between the parties.

William C. Nolan, a private, first class, in the Hospital Corps, testified that when Newton, the soldier who was assaulted by Mr. Tate, reported to the hospital for treatment, in answer to the question as to how he got hurt, said he went by the post-office and some one ran out and hit him with a six-shooter. I asked him if that was all he did, just to go by the post-office, and he said that it was, and I asked him who it was that hit him, and he said:

Oh, that's all right, we'll get them ——— of ——— some day. (P. 2654.)

It is fair to assume that Newton's comrades shared with him a spirit of resentment at the unjustifiable assault upon one of their comrades. Especially is this true when Newton's account of the assault made it more wanton and aggravating than the facts would warrant.

A lad, Bernard Kowalski, some 16 years of age, was attending a young people's party at the Cowan house on the night of the shooting. Young Kowalski testified that he was sitting in the window of the Cowan house when some negroes passed by within a few feet of him, and one of them said:

They are having a fine time in there, but in about a half an hour they will not have such a nice time.

Within an hour after this the house was riddled with bullets. Mr. Kowalski had gotten to his home, some seven blocks away from the Cowan house, when the shooting commenced. In answer to the question:

When you heard that shooting did you make any remark to your mother or any one as to who it was doing the shooting?

he answered:

Yes, sir; when I heard the shots this came to my mind right away what I had heard, and my mother was awake, and in the door I said, "Mamma, those are the negroes doing the shooting."

And in answer to the question:

Were those colored men that you heard make this remark dressed in soldier's uniform?

he answered:

Yes, sir.

Of the scores of witnesses examined by the committee none impressed its members with his absolute truthfulness more than this young man, Kowalski.

Mr. Cowen, whose house was the scene of the children's party, testified that about a week previous to the shooting he had been notified by an old colored man, a former servant in his father's household, that after pay day the negroes would shoot up the town, and that by reason of this information he purchased a Winchester, model of 1876, .45 caliber, and also purchased cartridges, but at the time his house was riddled with bullets his rifle was at home and he was down in the town. The testimony on this point was in part as follows:

Q. You have no idea why they should have singled out your house and shot into it, have you?—A. I do not know of anything.
Q. That fact was something of a surprise to you, was it not?—A. It was not a surprise to me.
Q. Why was it not a surprise to you?—A. Well, I had been notified that the negroes would shoot up the town of Brownsville.
Q. You had been notified by whom, and when?—A. By a negro man by the name of William Henry.
Q. William Henry?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. He is the man who testified before the grand jury?—A. I believe he did; yes, sir.
Q. Well, what did he tell you and where did he tell you?—A. He met me on the street and he said: "Mr. Louis, I want to tell you something." I said: "What is it, Billie," and he said: "You had better be prepared; I don't know that you can do anything, but they say—the negroes say—they will shoot up the town after pay day."
Q. After pay day?—A. Yes.
Q. About when was it he told you this?—A. About a week prior to the shooting.
Q. Well, can you give us the day of the month?—A. Seven days before the 13th; I will not say it was just seven days; I said about a week.

Mr. President, at the risk of being considered tedious, I have given substantially all the expressions of ill feeling between the colored battalion on the one side, and the citizens and police of Brownsville on the other. That there was an effort by the witnesses to minimize the feeling of ill will of each toward the other, no one who reads the evidence will doubt.

This brings us, Mr. President, to a consideration of the oral evidence before the committee bearing upon the issue as to whether or not the shooting up of the town of Brownsville on the night of August 13-14 was the act of any of the members of Companies B, C, and D. In the taking of the evidence the committee assumed, though not exactly correctly, that the military reservation lies south of the city of Brownsville, and is separated from it by what is known as Garrison road, about 30 feet in width. Between this road and the reservation, immediately in the rear, is a brick wall ranging from 3 to 5 feet in height. Three two-story barracks buildings, each 150 feet in length, with 30 feet of interval between them, lie parallel with the wall and 85 feet therefrom. Of these barracks the western was occupied by D Company, the next by B Company, and the third by C Company. Elizabeth street, the principal commercial street of the city, ran at right angles with the garrison wall, and was continued into the reservation through a large gate between D and B Company barracks. The street next east of Elizabeth ran at right angles with the wall and was called Washington street. Midway between these streets was what was known as Cowen alley, 20 feet in width and parallel with Washington and Elizabeth streets, and about 120 feet from each. Fourteenth, Thirteenth, and Twelfth streets, in the order named, were the next cross streets to Garrison road. The distance from Garrison road on the Cowen alley to Fourteenth street was about 200 feet, the blocks between Fourteenth and Thirteenth and Twelfth streets being about 300 feet in length, these cross streets having a width of 40 feet.

Within the territory I have named the shooting occurred. The rendezvous of the raiders was near the garrison wall in rear of B Company barracks, and between Cowen alley and Elizabeth street.

The uncontradicted evidence is that a number of shots were discharged near this point, and further that not a single bullet was fired at or into the barracks or in such a way as to endanger the life or limb of a soldier, while, on the other hand, three houses on the Brownsville side of Garrison road, namely, the telegraph office at the corner of Garrison road and Elizabeth street, the Martinez residence, and the Yturria house were fired into, the bullet holes being silent witnesses to the fact that all of the shots were fired from the direction of the fort toward the town and not one from the town toward the fort. The men who did the shooting proceeded from Garrison road north by the Cowen alley to Fourteenth street, on their way firing at least ten shots into the Cowen home, a small house standing back 5 feet from the alley and fronting on Fourteenth street; three shots were fired into the Garza house, which stood on the same side of Fourteenth street as the Cowen house, and on the opposite side of the alley and some distance back; two shots were fired into the Leahy Hotel, which extended back from Elizabeth street on the north side of Fourteenth street.

The chief object of the raiders in their march from Garrison road to Fourteenth street was the Cowen house, occupied by a man named Louis Cowen, of mixed Mexican and American blood. At the time of the shooting his wife and five children were in the house. This man Cowen had been intemperate and bitter in his talk against the negro soldiers. He was especially emphatic in his denunciation of the assault charged to have been committed upon Mrs. Evans, declaring to his neighbors that if any woman of his family or of his friends were insulted in any way by a negro soldier, he would take his Winchester and go down and kill him. Mr. Cowen talked a great deal—in fact, from the evidence talking seems to have been his principal occupation.

The Cowen home, as will be seen from the map, was less than 200 feet from the garrison wall. The girls of his family are described as "boyish." One witness testified to having overheard a conversation between one of them and a soldier on guard. On being asked by the soldier whether she was half Mexican or half negro, she replied that she was neither. The soldier said that she looked like it, to which she replied that the soldier "looked like an ape." Whether this furnishes any excuse for the firing into the Cowen house is a question for the Senate.

Major Blocksom, in his report, states that he was frequently informed that the Cowen children had made fun of the "nigger soldiers." In this connection it is but just to remark that Mrs. Cowen in her testimony said that the relations between her children and the soldiers were of the most friendly character.

The next house fired into with deadly intent was the Miller hotel on the south side of Thirteenth street and on the west side of Cowen alley at the corner. This hotel was run by a man by the name of Moore, who was pronounced in his objection to the coming of the negro soldiers to Brownsville. He, like Mr. Cowen, was emphatic in his declarations that they would get rid of the negro soldiers. The next assault was made on Tillman's saloon, also located on Cowen alley and about midway between Thirteenth and Twelfth streets and fronting on Elizabeth street. The attack on this saloon was made from the rear. One witness, and the only eyewitness to what occurred there, testified that four or five colored soldiers entered the courtyard from the alley at the back of the saloon, and when just inside of the gate leading to the alley fired the shot that killed Frank Natus, the bartender. Tillman, the proprietor, was one of the most pronounced of those who denounced the coming of the colored troops, and had in his saloon a separate bar in the rear with entrance from the alley for negroes, no negro soldiers being permitted to enter by the front. After the killing of the barkeeper at the Tillman saloon the raiders proceeded on to the Weller saloon, owned by a man by the name of Weller, who also had been bitter in his denunciation of the coming of the colored troops.

Mr. BULKELEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. WARNER. With pleasure.

Mr. BULKELEY. Will the Senator kindly give us the name of the witness to whom he alluded as having seen the shooting of Frank Natus in the Tillman saloon?

Mr. WARNER. I shall come to that in a few moments, I will say to the Senator, and the Senator will understand just how I am coming to it.

Mr. BULKELEY. I asked the question simply for information.

Mr. WARNER. It is always a pleasure to be interrupted by the Senator, but I will come to that in a moment.

Weller also maintained a separate bar in his saloon for negroes.

The attacking force next fired into the house of a Mr. Starck. The Starck house was next to and of exactly the same construction and appearance as the house occupied by Mr. Tate, the man who had struck the negro soldier, Newton, with a revolver a few days before. Some eight or ten bullets were fired into the Starck house.

When at the corner of Cowen alley and Thirteenth street the raiding party saw the lieutenant of police, Ignacio Dominguez, who was mounted on a light gray horse, and fired at him a number of shots, killing his horse and shattering his arm so that it had to be amputated. While, as I have stated, there is no evidence showing any difficulty between the police of Brownsville and the colored troops, yet the evidence does show that the officers and soldiers of the Twenty-sixth Infantry, which was succeeded by the colored troops at Fort Brown, were bitter in their denunciation of the Brownsville police. How much of the bitterness was transferred to the Twenty-fifth Infantry is simply a matter of conjecture.

The fact, Mr. President, stands out prominently in the evidence that the men engaged in the Brownsville affray directed no attack upon the soldiers, but their attacks were against persons who had been known to be hostile to their coming, those who either by word or act had taken part in the indignities to which the colored soldiers were subjected, all of which the soldiers naturally resented.

The shooting on the night of the 13th can find its expression in general and special motives of the soldier, but I submit, in the thousands of pages of evidence taken by the committee, together with the reports of the two courts-martial proceedings of Major Penrose and Captain Macklin and the evidence taken by inspectors at the instance of the President, there is an entire absence of evidence to show a motive on the part of anyone else to do the shooting. The people whose houses were attacked and whose lives were endangered were the people whose attitude toward the soldiers was known by the soldiers to be hostile.

The contention that the saloon keepers of Brownsville shot up the town finds no support in the evidence—in fact, the claim that the saloon keepers, in order to get rid of the colored troops, fired into the homes of their friends with a reckless disregard of their lives, while they were careful of the lives of the soldiers, is too great a tax on one's credulity. It is inconceivable that in order to rid the town of the negro soldiers the saloon keepers should attack their friends and sympathizers.

The raiding party started from the fort, making the attack upon the town and not upon the fort, upon citizens and not upon soldiers, riddling homes with bullets, but leaving no scar of a bullet upon any barrack or upon other buildings in the fort.

There is, Mr. President, direct evidence that the shooting was done by the soldiers. To this evidence I desire to direct the attention of the Senate. The first witness is Mr. G. W. Rendall, one of the survivors of the Perry expedition to Japan. As shown by the evidence, he was a man of character and one of the large property holders of the town of Brownsville. He and his wife occupied the second story of the telegraph office building on the northeast corner of Elizabeth street and Garrison road, directly opposite the gate entering the reservation from that street, his house being 35 feet from the garrison wall. He and his wife on the night of the shooting occupied the corner room, having a window facing Elizabeth street and another facing the Garrison road. He testified in part as follows (p. 2033):

Q. On the night of the 13th what was the first you knew of any disturbance?—A. I was asleep when the first shots were fired, and at the second shot, which probably was a second or two afterwards, I got up and went to my front window, which is the window facing toward the garrison.

Q. Toward the garrison?—A. Facing southeast; yes, sir.

Q. What is the width of the Garrison road at that point what you call Fifteenth street?—A. Thirty feet.

Q. Thirty feet?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And what is the distance from your house to the brick wall of the garrison?—A. From the window where I was looking out it was about 35 feet.

Q. When you heard this shooting—the first shooting—I will get you to state if you saw any parties moving about there at the garrison?—A. I looked out of the window—well, probably in two seconds after the second shot was fired, I just got out of my bed—my bed was within two feet and a half of the window—and looked out of the window, and at my right, at the entrance of the big gate going into the garrison, there are two lights over that, two large lights, and my attenion was naturally called toward those lights because the shots apparently were at the right-hand side of me, and I saw from three to five men coming apparently toward the big gate, as though they were coming out into Elizabeth street, but they were about halfway between the end of the barracks—D, I believe you call it; the lower one [indicating on map] they were about halfway betwixt there and here [indicating] when I saw them.

Q. That is the barracks that is nearest to the river?—A. Yes, sir; that is D. They were about there from the end of that barracks.

Q. Which end, the nearest to the gate?—A. About halfway to the entrance to the gate when I saw them. Just as I glanced at them there was a shot at the left and that drew my attention up that way.

Senator FORAKER. How many men did you say you saw there?

Senator WARNER. He said three to five.

Senator FORAKER. From three to five?

Senator WARNER. Yes.

The WITNESS. I looked up to the left and saw a number of men. I don't know how many, but I judge there were ten or twelve, and as my vision rested on those there were two shots fired, and I thought at the time that they were fired from a self-cocking pistol, and I think that the shots were fired from a pistol in the hands of one man. Now, I am not positive about that, but it was done just about as quick as a man would pull the trigger of a self-cocking pistol. These shots were elevated. I saw the flash from the weapon, and it was shooting up, nearly a north course, but elevated as though it was a signal of some kind, and I judged right away it was an alarm of fire.

Q. You thought it was an alarm of fire?—A. Yes, sir; seeing it elevated up, because I knew that the man was not shooting at anything. (P. 2033.)

Q. Were these shots inside of the inclosure of the barracks?—A. Yes, sir; they were inside. Those men were together—were grouped together at that time, and were about where that letter F is [indicating on the map].

Q. Now, will you please, in giving your answers, not say "right there" and "right here," but indicate it so that the stenographer may get down to something which will be intelligible? Will you mention what street it is on, or the location, as near as you can?—A. Well, they were about midway between the wall and the barracks.

Q. What barracks?—A. Barracks B; and they were moving that way, to the northwest, or the north [indicating]—the northeast I suppose it is. The line of this wall, I judge, runs nearly east and west. They were moving that way at the time those shots were fired. They were apparently coming together there from different places. (P. 2034.)

The witness then states that he went to the other side of his room and looked out to see if he could discover the light of a fire, and seeing nothing returned again to the window looking out upon Garrison road. Continuing, he said:

Q. That is, you turned to the side fronting on Elizabeth street?—A. Yes, sir; going across that room 20 feet, looking out of one window and then back and looking out of the other, was the time that I was not looking at these men. Outside of that, until they went over the wall, I was looking at them all the time. When I looked at them again, when I turned back to the window overlooking the garrison, they were close to the wall.

Q. Close to the wall inside or outside of the garrison?—A. Inside of the garrison. There is a little building right up there [indicating].

Q. You say "right up in there." Can you not describe the location?—A. Well, right abreast of the alley there was a small building in there, and they were huddled in there. Those I could see from the reflection of the light were in there. That building is whitewashed.

Q. That building is in rear of the wall of the barracks?—A. Yes, sir. * * * The next thing I saw of these men they were going over the wall, and after they got out into the street—into Fifteenth street—I could not tell which way they went. They were out of my sight. Except when they went over the wall they were so far away from the lights at the entrance to the post that it was hard for me to tell who or what they were. I just saw the forms. The only men I identified sure were those that were close to the window.

Q. You say the only men you identified sure were what men?—A. The only men I identified sure were the first ones I saw when I was looking out of the window. They were close up under the light.

Q. How many of them were there?—A. I think there were five of them, but I am sure there were three. I think there were five. You see, I just glanced at those men knowing they ought to be there, and I did not——

Q. Were those white men or colored men?—A. Those were colored men, with the army uniform.

Q. Speak a little louder.—A. They were colored men, black men, with the army uniform on.

Q. You say they turned, as I understood, up to the left? That is, you mean to the left as you were looking into the gate from Fifteenth street?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. They turned up there?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. And then they seemed to collect together before going over the wall, with other parties?—A. They collected together apparently with the intention of going over the wall at one place, and that was just at the west side of that—I don't know what you call it—it is a water-closet. (P. 2035.)

Q. Was your house shot into that night, Mr. Rendall?—A. Yes sir; there was one shot entered the house in the lower end of the roof. The roof projects over the siding. It passed through five thicknesses of lumber on that side of the house, through my mosquito bar over my bed, and through four thicknesses of lumber on the other side of the house, and went out. (P. 2036.)

* * * * * * *

Q. Now, you have only one eye, I believe?—A. That is all; only one good one and that is not extra.

Q. Are you quite clear, Mr. Rendall, that those three to five men that you saw there, that you speak of first, were colored men and soldiers, the men that you saw inside of the wall?—A. Positive that they were; yes, sir.

Q. Did you see any of the soldiers when they returned, if they were soldiers that you saw?—A. I did not. I was looking out of the window until the commissioned officer assembled the men and was calling the roll, and I did not see a man returning.

Q. Did you have any prejudice against the colored soldiers coming there?—A. No, sir; on the contrary, I was in favor of them coming there.

Q. You had no prejudice against them?—A. None whatever. (P. 2037.)

On cross-examination this witness testified:

Q. How many were there of these men all together, according to your present best judgment, who got over the wall?—A. Why, I can only say positively that I saw eight.

Q. You saw eight?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How did you arrive at that conclusion—at that number?—A. Simply because they were so close. They were nearer me and nearer the light than the others that went over above. There is a little building there——

Q. I mean how many got over the wall altogether?—A. That is what I am speaking of.

Q. Eight got over the wall?—A. The only ones that I am positive that went over the wall, that I could judge by the number, was the group that was next to me, and there was eight in that crowd.

Q. About eight or exactly eight—did you count them?—A. Sir?

Q. Did you count them so that you know?—A. No; I did not count them. It was just a glance at them. I estimated the number.

Q. You testified before the court-martial that you could not tell anything about what kind of men were going over the wall—"only I supposed it was the same men that I saw here down below." That is correct, is it?—A. Yes, sir; that is a fact. As I stated before, I had changed from one window to another while looking at these men, and I could not identify the same men when I saw them again, though it was not more than a few seconds.

Q. Notwithstanding your weak eyesight, having only one eye, and notwithstanding it was a pretty dark night, as I understand, you say you think you saw distinctly enough to testify positively about all these things, do you?—A. Yes, sir; I am positive that they were colored men wearing the United States uniform. (P. 2049.)

In order to test the witness's eyesight he was asked:

Q. You see all the objects in this room distinctly, don't you?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Can you tell how many men are at the end of the room without any difficulty?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. It is no trouble to you to tell?—A. No trouble at all.

Q. Could you tell if they were 100 feet farther away?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Tell how many there were and tell the color of them, whether they were white men or black men?—A. Well, there are two black men there at the end of the room.

Q. You see them distinctly?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. There are two black men at the door. You have no trouble at all in distinguishing objects near you, and you would not have if they were farther away? Now, do you see in the daylight at that distance without your glasses?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Distinctly?—A. Well, not as distinctly as I can with them; no.
Q. You could tell how men were dressed, at a distance of 100 feet away from you in the daylight?—A. Oh, yes.
Q. Without your glasses?—A. Very well.
Q. Tell the color of their clothes, whether they had on hats or caps, and all such things as that?—A. Certainly. (Pp. 2059 and 2060.)

As to this witness I feel justified in saying that his appearance upon the witness stand, together with his manner of giving his evidence, left no doubt upon the minds of any who heard him that he was giving the occurrences of the night of the shooting just as he believed he saw them.

There is some conflict in the testimony as to the lights on the post of the gate entering the fort from Garrison road. Mr. Rendall testifies that the lamps were there and lighted. In this he is fully supported by the testimony of Major Penrose, Sergeant Harris, and others, Major Penrose saying that on the night of the shooting you could see people by the light from the gate lamps "probably 20 feet readily."

Sergeant Harris testifies that during the roll call of his company he was stationed "about 20 or 25 yards" from the gate, and in answer to the question:

Q. Was there light enough so that you could have determined if anyone came in?—A. There were a couple of lights over the gate.
Q. Oil lamps?—A. Yes, sir; the light was clear so I could see as well as I can in this room.

This was one of the soldiers who saw this distance, 25 yards. Mr. Rendall saw but 35 feet.

It is conclusively shown by the evidence that the night was a clear star-lit one without a moon. So there is not any substantial reason for questioning the testimony of Mr. Rendall upon the ground that there was not sufficient light for him to have seen what he swore to having seen.

Mr. Rendall's wife testified to seeing forms of men between the barracks and the brick wall separating Garrison road from the reservation. She and Mr. Rendall were not at the same window except once and she did not have her attention directed to the soldiers whom Mr. Rendall testified he saw when he first looked out of the window.

She was asked:

Q. Did you remain at the same window with Mr. Rendall, or did you change from window to window?—A. No; I changed from window to window. We thought it was a fire, and I went from one window to the other alternately so that I could see any flames or any sign of it.
Q. Mr. Rendall owns considerable property along Fifteenth street (Garrison road), does he not?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. At the time of the shooting did you notice parties moving inside of the garrison near the wall?—A. No; not at that time. Just at the beginning I heard what seemed to be a confused sound of men moving, and low sounds as though low talking.
Q. Confused sounds of men moving, where? Inside the garrison wall?—A. Yes, sir; seemed to me just near the first barracks.
Q. When you speak of the first barracks do you mean the one nearest the river?—A. Nearest the river.
Q. That would be barracks D, the way it is marked on the map?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. What was this confused noise or sound that you heard. What did it sound like?—A. Well, it seemed like persons moving about as quietly as possible and yet making a confused noise. I could not understand it exactly. In fact, I did not think anything about it, but I heard this confused sound.
Q. After that did you notice the shadow of people moving there, inside?—A. It was after that that I saw the few men pass.
Q. Now, when you say you saw the few men pass, just explain that in your own way.—A. Well, I was looking from one of the windows, glancing out, and these men passed quickly along the wall, just a little distance from the wall, rather, but I simply glanced at them. I saw that they were men, but they passed on and got beyond my view in a moment or two.
Q. Was that inside or outside of the wall?—A. Inside. (Pp. 2060 and 2061.)

Q. Whereabouts, as near as you can tell us, this being barracks D, the one to the right of the gate as you go in, and this being barracks B, the one to the left of the gate as you go in, where were they?—A. Well, they were on the left.
Q. The left as you go on?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. Passing along there, then?—A. Passing toward the alley.
Q. This is the alley here. Did you observe close enough to see whether they were white men or colored men?—A. No, I could not.
Q. You just glanced at them?—A. Just saw that they were men moving, going quickly down. (P. 2061.)

Q. Did you observe closely enough to tell how many, or about how many, there seemed to be that you saw as you just glanced out and saw them passing on the inside there?—A. I think about six, possibly eight, but I think about six—five or six.
Q. You did not, I understand, pay particular attention to them; you just glanced out and saw them?—A. Just saw them at that moment.
Q. You are quite clear that you saw those men passing between the wall and the barracks?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. How were they moving, slowly or rapidly?—A. They were going quickly, and seemed to be well up together.
Q. You say that you and your husband were not at the same window all the time, but that you moved from window to window?—A. Except once, when we were standing at the window looking into Elizabeth street, when the shot struck the house. I believe that was the only time that we were. (P. 2062.)

Q. You did not see the men come over the wall?—A. No; I did not. I was not looking at that time. I could have seen them if I had been at the window at the time. Mr. Rendall did, but I was possibly at some other window.
Q. Mr. Rendall told you that he had seen the men going over, did he?—A. Yes, sir. (P. 2062.)

The fact that there was no attempt on the part of Mrs. Rendall and her husband to testify the same things gives additional weight to their evidence. Like her husband, Mrs. Rendall was possessed of intelligence and refinement.

We next pass to the house at the corner of the alley and Garrison road. This on the night of the shooting was occupied as bachelor quarters by one Jose Martinez, a drug clerk in Brownsville, and a man by the name of Shannon. At the time of the commencement of the shooting Martinez was in the corner of the northwest corner of the house, reading, This witness heard the soldiers jump over the wall, which was not more than 35 feet from his room, and when the shooting commenced he put out his light and lay upon the floor. What he saw and heard he tells as follows:

Q. You were in the house at the corner of the alley and Fifteenth street, or Garrison road?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. Where was your room in that house?—A. My room was this corner room right here. The house has three rooms. I was in the parlor in the northwest corner; I was in the parlor when the shooting occurred; I had not gone to bed yet.
Q. About what time of the night was that?—A. A little before 12.
Q. And where was the first shooting that you heard?—A. Right in front of my door.
Q. When you say in front of your door, do you mean it was in the alley or on Garrison road?—A. I mean inside of the garrison.
Q. Inside of the garrison?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. That is, inside the garrison between the garrison wall and the barracks?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. Now, you just state what you saw and what you heard.—A. Well, I heard the first shots, you know, and I tried to go out and see what was the trouble, and I heard many voices calling, "Hurry up" or "Jump," and I thought I would not go out. I blew the light out and lay down on the floor, closed the door and lay down on the floor. (P. 2072.)

Q. When you heard voices did you know what was said or distinguish anything that was said?—A. Generally they said, "Hurry up" and "Jump," but, as it was not my own language, I could not understand very well what was being said.
Q. Did you see any parties there get over the wall?—A. I could not say positively that I saw them, but I heard them jump.
Q. After you heard the jump what next did you hear or see of those parties?—A. The first thing I heard was the shots, some moments after that I saw people running toward the center of the town, running along the alley (Cowen alley).
Q. How many parties were there who were going down the alley toward the town?—A. When I saw them there were four or five, but I did not count any more.
Q. Was it so you could distinguish to tell whether these parties were white, or colored, or soldiers, or citizens?—A. I could distinguish the khaki uniform color, but it was impossible to distinguish—or I did not pay any attention to the countenances.
Q. State whether those parties who were going up the alley were going in direction of the Cowen house, marked No. 2, on the map?—A. They were.
Q. Where was the shooting that you heard after the parties had gone over the garrison wall?—A. Either in the street running in front of the barracks wall or at the corner of my house.
Q. When you saw the four or five men, as I understood, that went down the alley toward the Cowen house, did you see others go to Elizabeth street?—A. There were others, but I could not see in what direction they went.
Q. How many were there altogether that you saw?—A. Those whom I saw with my own eyes were only those that passed along the alley by my house.
Q. And how many were there?—A. Four or five.
Q. How were they dressed?—A. In light uniforms.
Q. Did you recognize or not whether they had guns, and if so, how they were carrying them?—A. They had guns and they were carrying them in this manner [indicating].
Q. That is, having the stalk of the gun at the hip?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. Were they white men or colored men?—A. They were people with dark faces, but I could distinguish the uniforms more clearly than I could the face.
Q. From what you saw there, did you recognize them as soldiers?—A. Yes, sir; because there were no other people there that wore that kind of dress or clothing and dark faces.
Q. Why was it you lay down on the floor?—A. Because I was afraid that they might shoot.
Q. Did you have a light?—A. At the beginning I had a light.
Q. What did you do with that?—A. I put it out. (Pp. 2072 and 2073.)

Q. Did you see those men before the light was put out?—A. I saw the reflection of the carbines before I put out the light. (P. 2074.)

There is no doubt that the opportunities and observations of this witness were not so good as those of Mr. and Mrs. Rendall, and this evidence is only strong and of importance because he testifies most positively to hearing the men jump over the garrison wall, and to seeing them fire at the mouth of the alley. It necessarily shows that if the men who did the firing came over the wall then they must have been inside of the reservation originally; and it tends strongly to show that the men who did the firing were the soldiers. This much is clear from the testimony of this witness, that the parties that he saw were dressed in the uniform of the United States soldiers, while he does not pretend to say that he could tell whether they were negroes or white men. This witness, as his evidence will show, was frank and direct in statement, with no attempt to color his testimony.

The next witness, a Mr. F. A. H. Sanborne, an ex-civil war veteran of the Twelfth Maine, and for twenty years telegraph operator at Brownsville. His office was on the ground floor of the Rendall Building, at the corner of Elizabeth street and Garrison road—his bedroom being just back of the telegraph office. He was aroused from sleep by firing which took place at the mouth of Cowen alley, which is described by him as a volley or an attempt at a volley. Upon getting out of bed and looking out of the door which faced the Garrison road, he saw a colored soldier in uniform, with a gun, returning through the gate into the reservation, he being at that time about 35 feet from the gate. When standing at the open window after the firing had ceased, he saw the colored soldier returning to the fort. He testified:

Q. You say you opened the window?—A. I opened the slats of the blind and looked out, and just as I was looking I saw coming along by the whitewashed garrison fence—I could see plainly because there was a lamp on each side of the large gate of the post—I saw a man come along. He walked along. The man I saw was a colored man in uniform, with his gun. He walked along the fence and did not seem to be very hurried; and passed through the small foot gate of the post and went in and went toward the barracks. After he passed the gate I could not see where he went. Everything was quiet then around the post.

Q. You could see him distinctly, then?—A. Yes, sir; very distinctly; especially as he approached the gate. The lights over the gate showed him plainly against the white or light gray wall.

Q. That wall you say is whitewashed?—A. I rather think that it is light gray, but it is faded nearly to white.

Q. How long has your office been there at that point?—A. About two years in that building.

Q. You recognized that party as being a colored man and a soldier?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You say you recognized his having a gun?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you see any other soldiers going in?—A. No others at all, sir.

Q. How long after that, if at all, did the shooting continue?—A. I think, I do not recall quite clearly, but I think the shooting had ceased, or rather this must have been right immediately before the time that the shooting ceased. (P. 2086.)

Q. It has been testified here that there was a soldier out who was out on pass and that he went in the gate. Might that not have been the soldier that you saw?—A. I think not. It is not usual for a soldier to have his gun with him when he is on pass or at any time, unless he is in the ranks.

Q. You are certain it was a gun?—A. Yes, sir; certain it was a gun.

Q. And you are certain he was a soldier?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. But you said a moment ago that the reason you thought he was a soldier was because you knew the uniform.—A. That is the reason I knew he was a soldier, from his bearing, his uniform, and so on.

Q. Didn't you form your opinion because you knew the soldiers were there and you thought he was a soldier that was going in?—A. I don't think so; I was positively convinced that the man was a soldier as much so as I would have been if I had seen he was a citizen or any other thing—indicated by his bearing, uniform, or anything of that kind. (P. 2088.)

There is nothing in the evidence tending to contradict the testimony of Mr. Sanborne. It is true that it was claimed that the information contained in certain telegrams sent to Major Blocksom and Major Penrose with reference to the removal of the troops from Brownsville after the shooting had gotten out among the people, but there is no evidence tending to show that such information was received from Mr. Sanborne. If he saw the colored soldier with a gun passing through the gate after the firing, it is the strongest evidence possible to show that this soldier was one of those who did the first shooting and who left the party and returned to the barracks without continuing on the march of destruction.

Following the trail of the midnight raiders in their reckless march, fatally bent on mischief, we come to the house of Louis Cowen, at the corner of Cowen alley and Fourteenth street. The Cowen home but a few minutes before the shooting was the scene of a children's party, resounding with the laughter of happy boys and girls. At the time of the arrival of the raiders the house, a one-story structure, was well lighted, the family not having retired when the shooting began, Mrs. Cowen, her five children, and a maidservant being the only occupants. The light from a window in the back room shone into the alley. It was in this window that young Kowalski was sitting when he heard the remark of the colored soldier less than an hour before: "They" [referring to the children] "are having a fine time in there, but in about half an hour they will not have such a nice time." The agony of the family in that midnight hour of terror was told by the mother in her testimony, in part, as follows:

Q. The night of this shooting up of the town you were at home, were you?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Of what does your family consist, Mrs. Cowen?—A. At the time I had six children. My husband was not at home that night, and the little one had not come. I had five children with me. There were the five children, my servant woman, and myself.

Q. Had there been a party at your house that night, a children's party?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. About how many children attended it?—A. Between thirty-six and forty children.

Q. Now, when this shooting commenced, how long before that was it that this children's party had broken up?—A. I should judge about a quarter of an hour. I think about that time; perhaps not quite; not more.

Q. Had you gone to bed when the shooting commenced?—A. No, sir; I was fully dressed, sitting at the head of the table, like I am right here at this table, waiting to get things ready for the night—I had that little boy to get things ready—and had sent the servant girl out for some hot water, and I was sitting at the head of the table just like I am here, just like this.

Q. In which room of the building?—A. In the middle room of the three back rooms which I have told you of, which was the dining room.

Q. Now, Mrs. Cowen, will you take your own time, and without any special questions, just state to us in your own way what you heard there of the shooting, and what occurred?—A. I was, as I told you, sitting at the head of the table, like this, and some of my children, the girls, were in the little room back of me, and my boy was in the room ahead of me. The dining room was small—the rooms are small—and I had told my eldest daughter; I said "Gertrude, do not go to bed; I do not feel well. Stay up with me. Somehow I am nervous;" and she said to me, "I will not go to sleep, mamma; I am just lying here, and when the girl comes in with the water I will get up and help you." Just then she came and stood alongside of the table, and she was partly undressed, and the servant girl came in, just about that distance [indicating], right like there, with a little pitcher of hot water, when we heard the first shots. Well, at the very instant the little children, of course, ran to me, you know, and they said, "Fire, mamma, fire." They all thought it was fire. I am quite familiar with the sound of army guns, because I have lived there twenty years of my married life, and I am perfectly familiar with the sound, especially during the Spanish war that they would have these sham battles, you know. Nothing could fool us to make us not know that it was the army guns. You could not but know that they were. The sounds were loud, you know; and then in the empty garrison, you know, we had heard the first shot, and then one, two, three, four, five shots, you know, and in the meantime the little ones all gathered around me, and I said, "Children, it is the soldiers;" but I thought that the soldiers and the policemen had gotten into a clash, you know. We never had had any trouble with anybody. I thought that they would go right on and we would be left behind, never for a moment believing that there would be any trouble. And with this, the shooting kept on, one, two, three, four, five shots again, you know, and it kept on coming closer, and I jumped up and I went to the hall door, and I said to the servant, "Oh, Mr. Louis is not at home!"

Q. That is your husband?—A. Yes, sir. He was always at home, he was a great home body, and was always at home in the evenings, but he had gone out to get me a lunch. It was late, and I was not well, and he said, "I will get you something, and I will be back in a minute." So I went to the front door and I kept on looking for Mr. Cowen, you know, and this servant girl said to me, she says, "Madam, it is best that he does not come, because he would never get here alive." In the meantime the back part of the house was completely thrown open, blinds and windows and doors and everything, and I was inexperienced. I didn't blow out my light, I didn't know that they would give me any more trouble. I never thought of anything, and the shooting kept on coming closer and closer, and the children all the time stood gathered by me, and when I heard that they were right on us, I said "Children, get under the bed;" they followed me into the bedroom, and I said, "Get under the bed, and pray God to save your lives. If we are alive to-morrow we will all go and thank God in church." They got under the bed—I could tell them what to do, but we were all simply paralyzed, you know—excepting me and my boy. My boy threw himself on the floor at the end of the bed, and I crouched down as close as I could, and again I would rise up, and then again the shooting began. We stood it because we were too frightened to be frightened, if there is such an expression. We were just paralyzed. We heard one shot, and then it seemed that we just waited to see if the next shot would strike us. It did not, but the next one might. It was horrible. Every now and then the girl would call to the little ones, you know, to see if they had been killed—just easy, you know. They were under the bed, and no one made a sound, no one cried or whimpered or anything. This poor girl, you know, still thought it was a fire.

Q. That is your little Mexican servant?—A. Yes, sir; she is as good a girl as you ever saw. She tried to protect us. When she saw that the shooting was right on us—the kitchen was open, and that helped to throw a light out into the yard. The dining room is in the middle, and with the lamp in there it was sufficient to light the three back rooms, you see. She went to the window, and she was there when she saw the soldiers right at the alley—the fence. My alley fence is no further than——

Q. What did she say when she saw the soldiers?—A. She still watched, she stayed there, when she saw them put a gun over the fence and blow out this lamp on the table. She was only that far, not three feet, from it [indicating].

Q. That is, when the shot blew it out?—A. Yes, sir. She dropped down then on the floor, and she couldn't close the windows any more, but she crouched and crept over until she got into my room. She was the only one that could see. She was the only one that had seen. We had the experience, but she had seen; and she panted and panted, she was so frightened.

In the different rooms of the Cowen house there were twenty-three bullet holes, the bullets entering the house from three to four feet above the floor. It was indeed, in the language of Mrs. Cowen, "a wonderful providential escape" that she and her children had. Placing the children under the bed for safety Mrs. Cowen attributes to the "providence of God," because she said "I don't know why I selected that place to put my children in; it was the only place they could have been safe; any place else they would have been killed."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 20471) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside so that the Senator from Missouri may complete his remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WARNER. I thank the Senator from Maine, but I will say that I am not feeling in the best of trim, and I should like to proceed for only a short time, with the courtesy of the Senate, to finish up the point I am just on.

Mr. HALE. I will await the convenience of the Senator.

Mr. WARNER. I am much obliged to the Senator.

Mrs. Cowen is a frail little woman of education and intelligence, her face being an index of purity and refinement. When upon the witness stand, months after the night of the shooting, in answer to the question of Senator Foraker, "You have been very much excited whenever this matter has been brought to your mind ever since, haven't you?" she said, "When I speak of it it seems like I could not breathe—like it would choke me."

Amada Martinez, Mrs. Cowen's maidservant, testified to seeing the colored soldiers when she attempted to close the shutters of the window opening on the Cowen alley, the soldiers at the time being only a few feet from her. She, like Mrs. Cowen, heard the shooting—heard it coming from Garrison road in the direction of their home, and, as might be expected, became excited and frightened. Realizing the danger, as the shooting came nearer and nearer the house, she ran to the back window of the corner room on the alley to close the blind when she saw what she described as two rows of five soldiers each, one of them about to fire into the house. The light in the kitchen shone into the alley. She testified that the men whom she saw were negroes in soldiers' uniforms. Her testimony is, in part, as follows:

Q. Were you at the Cowen house on the night of the shooting-up of the town of Brownsville?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. There was a children's party there that night, was there?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you hear the shooting that night?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. State in your own way now what you heard and saw. State it fully.—A. I was coming from the kitchen with a little jar of warm water and as I reached the door I heard the shooting begin. I heard the shooting coming from the barracks, and Mrs. Cowen told me to put the jar on the table. I went into another room and closed the door and stayed there for some time while the shooting took place. I was in the room, there, closing a shutter at the window and stood there for some time. While there I saw them coming, five in front and five behind, and then I turned around as the first shot entered the house, coming through the window over a table in the dining room. One of the shots went over my head and over a wardrobe. I allowed myself to drop down. Then I crawled the best way I could into Mrs. Cowen's room. Then I sat down there. Mrs. Cowen told me to sit down and not to move or go anywhere. Then I heard some voices talking and I went to the door of the passageway. (Pp. 2803 and 2804.)

Q. When you saw these men coming, as you say, five in advance and five back, could you tell whether or not they were soldiers?—A. Yes, sir: I saw that they were soldiers.
Q. How do you know that they were soldiers?—A. Because as I closed the window in the alley I could see them coming, and I could plainly see that they were soldiers.
Q. Do you know how the soldiers are usually dressed—the soldiers' uniforms?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. Were those men dressed the same as the soldiers you had seen there—the other soldiers?—A. Yes, sir. (P. 2804.)

* * * * * * *

Q. Where were you when the firing commenced?—A. I was in the little room; just as I was going to close the window.
Q. Do you mean the little room next the alley?—A. Yes, sir; next to the alley.
Q. Did you close the window?—A. I closed it and retired immediately.
Q. Were you closing the window or the shutters of the window?—A. The shutters of the window.
Q. Was the window raised when you went to it?—A. Yes, sir; the glass sash was up and open.
Q. And the shutters were thrown back?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you reach out and get hold of the shutters?—A. Yes, sir; this way [illustrating].
Q. And before you brought them together you let go and ran away, did you?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. And did not go to the window again?—A. No, sir.
Q. Whatever you saw then, you saw then in just the moment you were at the window trying to bring the shutters together?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. And that was before any shot was fired into your house?—A. Just as I turned around the firing began.
Q. The firing commenced at your house?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. But no shots had been fired into your house when you went to the window?—A. No, sir.
Q. Did you see that those were black men?—A. Yes, sir.
Q. How black did they seem to be?—A. They were black. I saw them well.
Q. Were they any blacker than a good many of the Mexicans are who live in Brownsville?—A. Yes.
Q. Much blacker than any of the Mexicans?—A. Yes.
Q. Were they black men or simply mulatto men?—A. Negroes.
Q. You are not mistaken about that?—A. No, sir; I saw them.
Q. Were they any blacker than the policeman, Padron?—A. Oh, yes. (P. 2805.)

It is evident that this Mexican girl was in a position which gave her an opportunity of seeing the men in the alley who were doing the shooting, for at most at the time she saw them they could not have been more than 5 or 10 feet from her.

The next group of witnesses were those who were in a hotel kept by Mrs. Leahy, the widow of an enlisted man, who at one time was stationed at Fort Brown. The Leahy Hotel, a two-story structure, fronted on Elizabeth street, extending back to the Cowen alley. It appears from the evidence that the room nearest the alley and some 20 feet away from it was occupied on the night of the shooting by a clerk in one of the business houses of Brownsville, named Herbert Elkins. The middle room was occupied by Judge Parks. The third room nearest Elizabeth street was vacant. These rooms, as it appears from the evidence, were so located as to enable a person standing at the window of either of them to see a portion of the upper galleries (porches) of B Company barracks. Mrs. Leahy testified that she heard the shooting and soon realized what it was; that upon the first report she ran upstairs into the vacant room and from its window saw flashes of guns discharged from the gallery of B barracks.

Mr. President, I am trying in a measure to bring before the members of the Senate who desire to hear it a synopsis of the evidence in this case, certainly with no attempt at rhetoric or oratory, and it is somewhat laborious. The Senator from Maine can now proceed with the regular order, and I will give way until to-morrow, thanking the Senator for his courtesy.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. Now, let us go on with the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 20471) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will resume the reading of the bill.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill at line 3, page 43, subheading "Public works under Bureau of Navigation."

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, under the subhead "Public works, Marine Corps," on page 48, line 9, before the word "officers," to strike out "three" and insert "four;" and in line 10, before the word "thousand," to strike out "ten" and insert "thirty," so as to make the clause read:

Barracks and quarters, Marine Corps: To complete four officers' quarters, marine barracks, navy-yard, Philadelphia, Pa., $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, line 16, before the word "marine," to insert "officers' quarters;" and in line 18, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty" and insert "seventy-five," so as to make the clause read:

For the completion of officers' quarters and marine barracks, naval station, Charleston, S. C., $75,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, after line 18, to insert:

For the completion of necessary repairs and improvements to such buildings at the naval station, New London, Conn., as have been assigned to the Marine Corps by the Navy Department, $10,000.

Mr. HALE. That clause is in twice. This should be taken out.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, on page 49, after line 4, to insert:

For the necessary repairs and improvements to such buildings at the naval station, New London, Conn., as have been assigned to the Marine Corps by the Navy Department, $10,000, which sum shall be in addition to the $25,000 appropriated for this object in the naval appropriation act approved June 29, 1906.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 49, line 13, before the word "thousand," to strike out "two hundred and ten" and insert "two hundred and seventy-five," so as to read:

In all, public works, Marine Corps, $275,000.

Mr. HALE. Before the word "thousand," in line 13, I move to strike out "seventy-five" and insert "sixty-five," so as to read "$265,000."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Medicine and Surgery," on page 50, line 3, after the word "wagons," to insert "automobiles;" and in line 4, after the word "cows," to insert "other than for hospitals," so as to read:

Contingent, Bureau of Medicine and Surgery: For tolls, ferriages, care, transportation, and burial of the dead; advertising, purchase of books and stationery, binding of medical records, unbound books, and pamphlets; hygienic and sanitary investigation and illustration; sanitary and hygienic instruction; purchase and repairs of wagons, automobiles, and harness; purchase of and feed for horses and cows other than for hospitals; trees, plants, garden tools, and seeds, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, as to the amendment just adopted, on page 50, line 3, inserting the word "automobiles," I wish to know whether or not the Senator from Maine can give us any information in regard to that matter.

Mr. HALE. It simply goes with the march of the times. Automobiles are recognized now not only as conveniences and necessities for private use, but for all large private establishments and for Government establishments.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, of course I understand that; at least I surmised that; but I want to know if there is any limitation whatever upon the number?

Mr. HALE. No.

Mr. BACON. Or upon the discretion of any officer as to what number he shall get or what amount he shall pay for them?

Mr. HALE. No more than there is upon the purchase of wagons or horses or any means or vehicles for transportation. The aggregate of the appropriation is not increased by introducing this word, and the limitation will be that only the amount can be expended that Congress appropriates. What amount will be needed for automobiles or for wagons I do not know, and I know of no way of finding out.

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, I only make the inquiry because I suppose the committee, in making up the aggregate, must have had some idea as to the details. It is simply an illustration of the absolute impossibility—and that is the purpose I had in calling attention to it—of our doing what the Senator from Maine a few days ago so eloquently and earnestly urged upon us that we should do—look into the expenditures of the Government and endeavor, if possible, to curtail them.

It is an absolute and utter impossibility for Senators, with a paragraph such as this, beginning on page 49, under the head of "Contingent, Bureau of Medicine and Surgery"—and I do not select this because of any special objection to any item, but simply to illustrate what I say as to the impossibility of Senators forming any judgment about it or voting intelligently—there is a page of items, I suppose, glancing at it with my eye over the page, there are probably two dozen different items of all kinds from tolls, ferriages, care, transportation, and burial of the dead, to automobiles, quarters at hospitals, trees, shrubs, dispensaries, and many other things, and these all lumped up with a sum of $60,000.

Of course there is nothing for us to do but to vote for the provision upon the assumption that it is necessary; but the Senator will pardon the suggestion I make, which is not for the present, and not particularly for this body, but as to the method which should be pursued—I say "should be;" probably that is too strong an expression to one who is, you might say, a layman—but it does seem to me that the appropriation bills ought to come with such classifications as to enable us to have some little idea as to whether or not the amounts appropriated are proportioned to the needs of the service, which is an utter impossibility as such bills are now presented.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senator is right in his proposition that the Senate ought to know as much as is possible in the way of information about all these appropriation bills; but the contingent expenses—these being for the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery—in all the Departments and in all the bureaus are made up of so many little items, and items that vary from year to year, that it has not been deemed necessary nor advisable by the committees in either House to scrutinize these subjects and to detail the amounts to be expended for each one of the small items. I suppose that might be done, but it would take an immense labor by the committee; it would take great space on appropriation bills, and I doubt if the benefit derived would be commensurate with the additional labor.

We have to trust these details of expenditure to the proper officials. The authority and check we have upon them is in the amount of money that we give to them. While I see what the Senator desires should be done, I doubt whether, if he were examining the chief of a bureau on this matter of contingent expenses, he would think it worth while to spread out upon the record the amount for every one of these small items. At any rate, the committee did not think that essential.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HALE. I do; certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is one item, in line 4, on page 50, that provokes an inquiry in my mind. That is the item as to "cows." This provides for "the purchase of and feed for horses and cows other than for hospitals." If those last words had not been there I would have supposed that that item of "cows" was in connection with the hospitals, perhaps for the purpose of securing a supply of pure milk; but why it should provide for the keeping of cows in connection with the Navy Department and then except the only purpose for which I could imagine cows might be kept, awakens an inquiry in my mind.

Mr. HALE. Of course this is an item for the feed.

For horses and cows other than for hospitals.

It is not for the purchase of horses and cows, which, I suppose, they already have. It is simply for the feed.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it would seem to me that the feeding of an animal necessary in connection with any Department would belong to the class of items or the item for purchasing or acquiring the animal; and unless there is some other provision in the bill for acquiring these cows in connection, I presume, with the hospital, I can imagine no other branch of the service of the Navy where a cow would be kept by the Government of the United States.

Mr. HALE. They have already got the cows and horses, and this is for the feed.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of course if they have them, they must feed them.

Mr. HALE. Well, they have them.

The Senator knows that there have been great amplifications in the bureaus and the Departments. The Department of Agriculture is dealing now with the purchase, testing, and use of machinery, of animals, and of almost everything that is used in every branch of human industry. Other Departments are following on, not with quite equal footsteps, but as near as possible, and are "doing business generally at the old stand," and using everything and every kind of appliance that is used in private business.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. I have set myself sometimes against this. I do not like it very much, but it is like trying to swim up Niagara. All the Departments do it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, remembering the discussion of the Army bill lately and the criticisms made upon it, I desire to say that I do not recall anything in the Army bill that provides for cows; but of course if cows are necessary on shipboard I think we ought to feed them.

Mr. HALE. I am very glad that there is one Department that has not got any cows in it.

Mr. WARREN. And the agricultural appropriation bill surely does not provide that cows shall be taken to sea.

Mr. HALE. Some years ago, I remember, in running an appropriation bill in the other House there was some provision for horses for the Marine Corps, and the question was asked what the Marine Corps had to do with horses. Well, it turned out that when they are stationed on shore and have a bureau they have to have a carriage and they have to have a horse. These have to be paid for and the Government has to foot the bills. I am very glad that the War Department has not provided for such things, but I suggest to the Senator from Wyoming, as he has made that statement, that he look particularly into all of the Army posts and the different depots and stations of the Army and I shall be surprised if he does not find somewhere at these posts that they even have cows. [Laughter.] Maybe not, but they will soon have them if they have not now.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Maine has convinced me that we ought to have them, and I presume the Senator will help me in the next bill to provide for them.

Mr. HALE. I have given up all opposition to it. I shall not contend against it, because it will go anyway.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, my attention was attracted by these items, one of which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] suggested. Automobiles and cows for the Navy of the United States! Well, a more inappropriate provision for the Navy of the United States than either of those items I can hardly imagine.

Mr. HALE. The Senator understands that the naval hospital—whose inmates are provided for by the Government, have got to eat and drink and have milk and everything else except beer and liquors—is on shore. We rarely put one of these hospitals afloat at sea, unless it makes a part of the military establishment. They are in the Navy, but of course they are on land and subject to the necessities and the appetites that are common to mankind on shore.

Mr. HEYBURN. But, Mr. President, I think that in every instance the naval hospitals are conveniently located to the wharves.

Mr. HALE. No.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not well informed in regard to the location of naval hospitals, but those with which I am acquainted are conveniently located to water. However, it is the beginning of a new departure to provide the Navy with automobiles.

Mr. HALE. It is undoubtedly; it is the beginning of a new departure to provide anybody with automobiles.

Mr. BACON. I would suggest to the Senator from Idaho that possibly he may be relieved of his difficulty by offering an amendment putting in before the word "cows" the word "sea." [Laughter.] Then it will surely be covered.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, Mr. President, it has also occurred to me that in connection with the word "automobiles," I might offer an amendment to make it read "water automobiles," inasmuch as I have recently seen in the Scientific American a picture of water automobiles. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE. I also suggest where the word "horse" occurs the addition of the word "marines," so that it will read "horse marines." [Laughter.]

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not desire to offer an amendment. I desired simply that attention might be called to the fact that we were providing for the care of cows in the Navy—for dairies, I presume, on shipboard.

Mr. BACON. I desire to say simply a word in response to the suggestion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] in regard to the difficulty of going into details. I do not wish to be misunderstood in regard to the matter, and I repeat that I have no special criticism upon this particular provision. My suggestion was, not that all details should be expressed in the bill, but that there should be a classification; in other words, I think it is very well that, if there is an item providing for automobiles, there should be some estimate as to how much the automobiles are going to cost; or, if there are items for horses or cows or any other particular articles, there ought to be such a classification as will enable the Congress to have some idea as to whether the estimate for the expenditure is excessive.

I want to call the attention of the Senator from Maine to what I think is the main difficulty in this method of appropriation. I am not criticising the amount of this appropriation; it may be all right; but, after enumerating articles which occupy perhaps a page, enumerating automobiles, harness, feed for horses and cows, trees, garden tools, dispensaries, for washing, and for everything else that can be imagined, it winds up in this way:

And all other necessary contingent expenses * * *, $60,000.

Leaving it absolutely without limitation or qualification to the officer who will be charged with this disbursement to say which of these articles he shall buy and which he shall not buy, or how many of them he will buy and how many of them he will not buy, and then how many articles he will buy that are not enumerated, or how many expenses he will incur for articles not suggested in this enumeration. In other words, there is absolutely nothing in such a method of appropriation to put Congress upon notice and enable them to judge whether or not the expenditure is proper or improper. While it is impossible—not only impracticable and inconvenient, but impossible—to specify all details in appropriating for any one of the Departments, and particularly this one of which the Senator speaks as having a great many small matters to look after—while that is impossible, it is possible to have the items so classified that the officer in charge of the disbursement or expenditure will be limited to the particular estimate for particular classes of articles and not be turned loose, as he is in this item and as he is in other items—I am not criticising this one in particular; I am only using it for illustration—turned loose to absolutely do as he pleases. The effect of it, Mr. President, is this——

Mr. PERKINS rose.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from California will pardon me a moment, until I finish this particular thought. I see that he desires to interrupt me.

The effect of it is that the matter of expenditure, while it is nominally in Congress, is absolutely in the bureaus; and what the Senator has said about what will be found upon investigation as to the expenses of various kinds being incurred by any one particular bureau illustrates what I say.

I presume the other House proceeds very much as we do, and certainly there is no opportunity here for us to know anything about these items. The Secretary from the desk reads the headnote, omits perhaps a whole page following, and then says "$60,000." We do not even have the opportunity to look at it, much less to judge of it. The effect is this, that the bills are estimated for by the Departments, and I presume they are largely framed by the Departments, and we go through the form of appropriating without anybody on this floor knowing anything whatever about the matter. I challenge any Senator here to show to the contrary. He may think to the contrary; but let him attempt to show, if he can, the amount of expenditure for any one of these items, and the fact will be shown plainly that we legislate absolutely in the dark, simply upon the estimates of the bureaus, and leave the bureaus then to determine in what manner they shall make the expenditure. So far as appropriations are concerned we are rapidly becoming simply a bureaucracy.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. PERKINS. I simply wish to say to the Senator from Georgia, Mr. President, that the language of the bill is meant to cover all contingencies. There is nothing expended until a requisition has been duly made out, properly signed by the superior officer, and then passed through the pay department regularly up to the Auditor. Therefore, unless you give the officer this free range in accounts, so that he can certify to them, it will be impossible for us to meet these incidental expenses which we could not provide for by enumerating them.

My friend from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] has referred to the cows, and so forth, in the Navy. I want to say, in behalf of your committee, Mr. President, that there are many other things we might have included in this bill. For instance, there are the dog watches. [Laughter.] It is a wonder we have not provided for the dogs, for certainly we have two dog watches every day on every ship of the Navy.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. I take it for granted that it is not within the contemplation of this appropriation to provide for sea dogs. [Laughter.]

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I want to say that the Senator from Louisiana desires me to ask the Senator from California, who is familiar with nautical matters, whether we have done away with the "cat o' nine tails?" [Laughter.]

Mr. PERKINS. We have dispensed with the "nine tails" now and are putting the "cat" on short rations. [Laughter.] We also have not provided in this bill for the "hatchway," a matter with which the Senator probably is familiar, as he has traveled across the ocean. There are many other contingent expenses which we have not enumerated.

But I want to say seriously to my friend from Georgia that if he will go down to the Auditor of the Navy Department he will find that every dollar of the appropriations provided for in this bill is properly expended according to the certificate of the commanding officer. Even in the engineers' department he will find that for the ball of waste, the can of oil, and everything else, a requisition is made and approved by the commanding officer. So it is with the stewards' department; so with the mates' department, the boatswains' department, and every other department of the Navy. If there is any other way which the Senator from Georgia or any other Senator can suggest whereby we can provide for all these expenditures for the Navy, I will thank him, as one member of the committee, if he will inform us.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, all pleasantries aside, of course we understand that a great deal of the business of the Navy Department is done on land, and I dare say they need the automobiles they ask for.

As to the appropriations under the head of "Contingent," I assume that the practice in the Navy has been the same as in the Army. The Quartermaster in the Army has a table which shows where every dollar has gone for every item of contingent expenses during the past fiscal year, and upon that showing estimates are made for the coming year. The distribution thus made is put in print, and is before the committee in the make-up of the bill. I assume that the Senator from Maine has seen such a list and examined it in connection with the consideration of this bill. But the bill does not subdivide sufficiently, and therefore yesterday I submitted the amendment which I did and which the Senator from Maine accepted. I shall hope to see a more minute subdivision in the next bill than in this, but there will always be necessity for some appropriation for contingent expenses, and that must be used in the judgment of some proper officer, the items for which can not be named beforehand.

Mr. BACON. I think that is undoubtedly true, Mr. President; but while that is true, it would be rendered very much safer and freer from abuse if there were a subdivision such as that to which the Senator refers, so as to leave articles properly to be embraced within the general contingent fund of less range than that they now have.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I shall not consume any more time of the Senate upon these matters. Individually, they are small, and the aggregate is in no case very great. In all the appropriations which go to swell the bill and make up its large proportions the items are given in terms and in amount, so that "he who runs may read." As to the little items under head of "Contingent," there has always been a good deal of discussion, as I have said, and I presume there always will be.

While I am up, Mr. President, I want to call attention to some large matters in the bill. I see that complaint has been made, and a Senator brought me not long ago a copy of a well-known and important New York paper, announcing not only all kinds of war outside, but in the Senate, and also that the committee had not cared, by proper appropriations, for new construction authorized in the House bill and reported by the Senate committee. I wish to say right here that for beginning the work upon the battle ships, destroyers, and submarines no appropriation was made in the House, the attempt being made there and voted down upon the theory announced that no appropriation would be needed until the December session of Congress. When the bill was reported no estimate covering these conditions had come to the Senate committee, but since then estimates have come in calling attention to the fact that upon this new construction—the two battle ships, the submarines, and the destroyers—certain amounts of money could be expended, giving, in some cases, the total for the entire expenditure. In accordance with that late estimate I have prepared an amendment which I shall offer for the committee. I am almost sorry for this, because I want to keep this bill, as far as possible, within the limit of the money that we can afford to appropriate, considering the conditions of the revenue. The amendment, which I shall offer at the proper time, covering the submarine boats, destroyers, and battle ships, provision for which will be found upon pages 87 and 88, would increase the amount carried by the bill beyond any figures which I have given before, because I had not contemplated this necessity. It will add, if the Senate passes it and sends it to the House, $7,000,000 to the bill. So when the bill goes back to the House, on these items alone—to commence the work on the new structures—it will have been increased $7,000,000.

I state this now in order that Senators or newspaper men or anybody else may possess their souls in peace, because the committee is ready, when it sees the necessity for a thing, to report it to the Senate, and the Senate will have an opportunity either to vote on or off these amendments, and when they go to the House the bill will be very large. I said more than once that even with the limitations, even with the two battle ships and not the four, the bill is much larger than it ever has been before; and these amendments, on the basis of the report of the committee, will add $7,000,000 more in money to it.

Mr. BACON. Suppose we have four battle ships; I will ask the Senator how much the increase would be, necessarily?

Mr. HALE. That would add, not all for this year, but for the next year or two, about $22,000,000.

Mr. BACON. How much in this particular bill?

Mr. HALE. About $4,000,000.

Mr. BACON. I understood the Senator to say $7,000,000 for the two.

Mr. HALE. That includes the destroyers. It is about five millions for the battle ships.

Mr. WARREN. What does the Senator include in that statement?

Mr. HALE. I have included machinery, material, armor, armament, and equipment.

Mr. WARREN. As a matter of fact, the $7,000,000 is really to carry out what the House has legislated for and failed to provide the money to carry out?

Mr. HALE. I do not think it can all be expended between now and December. I think there was some ground for the attitude taken by the House, that there would not be much needed before December. But still if it is not expended before December, it will go right on, instead of being part of the appropriations which we will have to make afterwards to complete these structures.

Mr. WARREN. I am assuming that the fact as to the naval bill is very much as the fact in respect to the Army bill, where the House provided for raising the pay of the entire enlisted force, amounting to some $6,000,000 or more, but did not appropriate a dollar with which to pay it. I assume this is very much the same.

Mr. HALE. The House, I think, had rather more reason for its action. It is not for me to criticise. It was not a matter of inadvertence. It was brought up, and the Representative in charge, selected to manage that side of the affair in the House, moved these appropriations, and they were rejected.

Mr. WARREN. In that case, then, it differs from that of the Army bill?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. Because, in that case, the amendment never was offered even by the committee to the Army bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will resume the reading of the bill.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 51, after line 13, to insert:

The nurse corps (female) of the United States Navy is hereby established, and shall consist of one superintendent, to be appointed by the Secretary of the Navy, who shall be a graduate of a hospital training school having a course of instruction of not less than two years, whose term of office may be terminated at his discretion, and of as many chief nurses, nurses, and reserve nurses as may be needed: Provided, That all nurses in the nurse corps shall be appointed or removed by the Surgeon-General, with the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, and that they shall be graduates of hospital training schools having a course of instruction not less than two years. The appointment of superintendent, chief nurses, nurses, and reserve nurses shall be subject to an examination as to their professional, moral, mental, and physical fitness, and that they shall be eligible for duty at naval hospitals and on board of hospital and ambulance ships and for such special duty as may be deemed necessary by the Surgeon-General of the Navy. Reserve nurses may be assigned to active duty when the necessities of the service demand, and when on such duty shall receive the pay and allowances of nurses: Provided, That they shall receive no compensation except when on active duty. The superintendent, chief nurses, and nurses shall respectively receive the same pay, allowances, emoluments, and privileges as are now or may hereafter be provided by or in pursuance of law for the nurse corps (female) of the Army.

The reading was continued to the end of line 18, on page 53.

Mr. BACON. I do not see the Senator from Maine in his seat.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. He has just stepped out for a moment. He will be right back.

Mr. BACON. I do not know whether any other member of the committee can answer the question I wish to ask, but I presume so. It is whether this amount is the amount for the subhead "Bureau of Supplies and Accounts" or whether it includes preceding amounts? On page 53 the Clerk has just read, summing up:

In all, $6,931,153.75.

Mr. PERKINS. If the Senator desires, I will read from the Book of Estimates, which I have before me, how that total is made up.

Mr. BACON. No; the Senator misunderstands me. I simply want the information whether that large item of $6,931,000——

Mr. PERKINS. This is confined to the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts—that is, the paymaster of the Navy.

Mr. BACON. It includes the pay?

Mr. PERKINS. That is as it came from the House.

Mr. WARREN. What the Senator from Georgia refers to is the item for the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, and whether the total contained in the last part of the paragraph includes any item above the subhead on the preceding page.

Mr. BACON. That is what I want to find out—whether the $6,931,000 is simply the appropriation for the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts or whether it includes prior subdivisions which have been passed over. Is it confined exclusively to the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts?

Mr. LODGE. I will say to the Senator that it covers all the rations of the Navy—all the provisions for food.

Mr. BACON. I understand. I simply wish to know whether, under the heading "Bureau of Supplies and Accounts," there were contained the items for which the appropriation of $6,931,000 is made.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; and nothing else.

Mr. BACON. Or whether that amount includes any items prior thereto?

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. BACON. It includes simply that.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of line 21, on page 58, the last paragraph read being as follows:

In all, civil establishment, Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, $103,978.34.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Maine will pardon me for a moment. I ask simply for information. We have just passed an item for the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, six million nine hundred and thirty-one and odd dollars. Then the next item, the one last read by the Clerk, is "Contingent, Bureau of Supplies and Accounts." I desire the Senator to explain to us the difference between the "Bureau of Supplies and Accounts" and "Contingent, Bureau of Supplies and Accounts."

This last item adds over a hundred thousand dollars to it. I simply desire to know what is the difference between the two. In what does the difference consist, and why do they have to be separated?

Mr. HALE. Because the first paragraph consists of the larger expenses and items in the Bureau appropriated for by Congress. The contingent is just such an appropriation as we had up about the contingent for the Bureau of Medicine and Surgery. It is made up of small items. It is contingent upon the operation, and we have always kept them distinct and apart. There is this limitation, in that as to each of these items the amount is fixed so that they can expend only so much. If we put them all into one, then they could expend the whole of it or any part of it, and we divide as much as we can.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, under the subhead "Bureau of Construction and Repair," on page 60, line 8, before the word "thousand," to strike out "eighty-three" and insert "fifty-three;" in line 15, after the word "dollars," to insert "the Maine, $562,500;" in line 23, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifty-five;" and in line 24, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifty-five," so as to read:

And the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized from the foregoing appropriation to make expenditures for repairs and changes on the vessels herein named in an amount not to exceed the sum specified for each vessel, respectively, as follows: The Brooklyn, $453,500; the San Francisco, $600,250; the Baltimore, $653,300; the Alabama, $667,500; the Illinois, $667,500; the Iowa, $557,500; the Kearsarge, $673,500; the Kentucky, $673,500; the Maine, $562,500; the Adder, $46,500; the Bennington, $195,750; the Grampus, $57,500; the Moccasin, $46,500; the Pike, $57,500; the Paul Jones, $77,000; the Nicholson, $55,000; the O'Brien, $55,000.

Mr. HALE. The committee have several amendments to the amendment made necessary by the new estimates the Department has sent in. I will send them to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine proposes amendments to the amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 60, line 1, strike out "from the foregoing appropriation;" in line 2, after the word "expenditures," to insert "from the appropriate fund under the various bureaus."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 60, lines 15 and 16, strike out the words "five hundred and sixty-two" and insert "six hundred and fifty-seven," so as to read "the Maine, $657,500."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 60, line 24, strike out the word "twenty-four" where it appears before the word "thousand" and insert "nineteen."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 61, line 1, strike out the words "five million five hundred and sixty-three thousand three hundred dollars and eighty-eight cents" and insert "six million two hundred and forty-five thousand eight hundred dollars."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLAY. With the permission of the Senator from Maine, I wish to call his attention to the provisions of the bill on page 60, before we leave it. I hold in my hand a copy of a provision that we inserted in the last naval appropriation act. The naval appropriation act approved March 2, 1907, provides as follows under the caption "Bureau of Construction and Repair," subhead "Construction and repair of vessels:"

* * * Provided further, That no part of this sum shall be applied to the repair of any other ship when the estimated cost of such repairs, to be appraised by a competent board of naval officers, shall exceed 20 per cent of the estimated cost, appraised in like manner, of a new ship of the same size and like material: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall deprive the Secretary of the Navy of the authority to order repairs of ships damaged in foreign waters or on the high seas, so far as may be necessary to bring them home: And provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy shall hereafter report to Congress at the commencement of each regular session the number of vessels and their names upon which any repairs or changes are proposed which in any case shall amount to more than $200,000, the extent of such proposed repairs or changes, and the amounts estimated to be needed for the same in each vessel; and expenditures for such repairs or changes so limited shall be made only after appropriations in details are provided for by Congress. * * *

In pursuance of that law, the Navy Department has made a report to Congress setting forth the repairs that ought to be made on each vessel, naming the vessel, and the cost of repairing it. I have that report here. It says:

Pursuant to the foregoing, I have the honor to report that the following vessels will probably require general overhauling to the extent of $200,000 or more—

Naming them.

Then follows a letter from W. L. Capps, Chief Constructor, United States Navy, Chief of Bureau, in which he says:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR,
Washington, D. C., January 11, 1908.

SIR: 1. Referring to the provision of the naval appropriation act for the fiscal year 1908 that the Secretary of the Navy shall report to Congress the number of vessels and their names upon which any repairs or changes are proposed which in any case shall amount to more than $200,000, the extent of such proposed repairs and changes, and the amounts estimated to be needed for same on each vessel, the Bureau has the honor to state that the following vessels will probably require general overhauling during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909. In each case a brief statement of the character of the work involved and the estimated total expenditure under this Bureau only is given:

Brooklyn.—General overhauling; rearrangement of magazines and ammunition hoists in connection with the fitting of new intermediate battery; fitting fire-control system; modernization of turrets in accordance with present requirements. Estimated cost, $275,000.

The pending bill, for the same item, on page 60, carries $453,500, instead of $275,000 estimated by the Navy Department.

Now, take the next ship, the San Francisco.

San Francisco.—General overhauling; necessary work for converting into a ship for laying mines; work in connection with installation of new boilers; miscellaneous improvements of moderate cost. Estimated cost, $200,000.

This bill carries for that identical ship $600,250, more than $400,000 more than the estimate made by the Navy Department.

Again, with the Senator's permission, take the Baltimore.

Baltimore.—General overhauling; necessary work for converting into a ship for laying mines; work in connection with installation of new boilers; miscellaneous improvements of moderate cost. Estimated cost, $200,000.

The item in this bill is $653,300.

Take the Alabama. The report of the Navy Department says:

Alabama.—General overhauling; work in connection with changes in battery and magazines to bring them into accord with the present practice; installation of ammunition hoists and other turret fittings in accordance with present requirements; miscellaneous alterations and improvements of moderate cost. This vessel was originally commissioned October 16, 1900, and has been continuously in commission since that date, without any general overhauling. The vessel is now provided with a modern fire-control system. Estimated cost, $350,000.

The appropriation in the bill to repair the ship Alabama is $667,500.

Take the Illinois. The estimate for repairing the Illinois made by the Navy Department was $350,000, and this bill carries $667,500 for repairing that ship.

Take the Iowa. The general estimate made for repairing that ship by the Navy Department January last was $350,000, and the pending bill carries for the Iowa $557,500.

Now, take the next ship, the Kentucky. The estimate made by the Navy Department for repairing this ship January last was $350,000, and the bill carries $673,500.

There are some other vessels for which smaller amounts are estimated. I go to the next page of the House document which I have before me and in the estimates made I find that for the Adder the estimate was $24,500, and the bill carries $46,500; for repairing the Bennington the estimate was $75,000, and the bill carries $195,750. There is another ship—the Grampus. The estimate was $33,500, and the bill carries $57,500. For the Pike the estimate was $33,500, and the bill carries $57,500.

I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Maine to the fact that these are House items, but in the last appropriation act we required the Secretary of the Navy to make careful estimates of the amounts that would be necessary to repair each ship, naming each ship, and the cost of the repairs, and in January last, less than three months ago, the Navy Department sent to the House estimates as to how much it would cost to repair each of these ships, and the amounts in this bill, in most instances, are even treble the amount of the estimate made by the Navy Department.

I am unable to see how there has ever passed the House an appropriation of $650,000 for repairing a ship when the Navy Department in January last insisted that only $200,000 was necessary to make the repairs. These are not Senate items; they are House items. Here is one ship that has been in commission only four years, and we are asked in this instance to give $650,000 to repair it.

There is another item here of $562,500 in regard to the Maine. I do not remember when the new Maine was built and commissioned, but it has been only a very few years since the old Maine was destroyed, and I am unable to understand how a ship commissioned two or three years ago can cost at this time more than half a million dollars for repairs. All these items are on pages 60 and 61 of the bill, and the House document which I hold in my hand goes into details, showing how the repairs ought to be made, and they even say that they make a liberal estimate in regard to the cost of these changes and repairs.

The Senator from Maine may be in possession of other information since this report was made in January which will show that these ships must be changed to meet new conditions, but at least the Senate ought to be put in possession of that information. The Senator will find all these items in House Document No. 656 of the Sixtieth Congress. Undoubtedly he is perfectly familiar with it.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, if I had been asked to give the reason for the appropriations on this page I should have had read the statute that the Senator from Georgia has most opportunely presented and read to the Senate. The statute which the Senator from Georgia has cited was a most important act, a much-needed act. The necessity for it is illustrated by the natural wonder of the Senator that a big ship costing millions and millions of dollars should so soon after she is completed need such heavy repairs.

That is one of the infirmities of the big battle ships. They begin to repair them almost as soon as they are set afloat. A battle ship is being constantly repaired and almost rebuilt, and at the end of ten years, when her repairs will perhaps have amounted to half as much as the original cost of the ship, it is discovered that she is obsolete.

Now, Mr. President, these conditions can not be helped. We have started upon the establishment and maintenance of a great navy. As Sir William White, a most competent authority, for years formerly at the head of the British Admiralty, and who lately visited this country, and whom I had the pleasure of seeing and talking with on naval matters, said:

> You have, all things considered, the best fleet in the world; it is not as large as that of Great Britain, but next to it. You have what we have not got, because while we spent hundreds of millions of dollars upon ships that soon became obsolete, you waited and did not begin the construction of these big ships until some ten or twelve years ago. Those that you have are the best of their kind, corresponding with ships that were built at the same time. But you will find, just as we have found, that the expense of a navy begins only when you have built the ship.

That is the fundamental condition which accounts for the statute the Senator has read and the appropriations which cover this page of the bill. We found that unless by law we directed the Department to estimate specifically and Congress to appropriate specifically, not only would the Department urge upon us enormous programmes for new ships, but it would go on and reconstruct old ships without the knowledge of Congress as to the extent of that work.

Based upon the belief (perhaps it is heresy to-day) that Congress had something to do with the building of a navy, and with the appropriations that it should make, and with the expenditures that it should authorize, upon the theory that Congress has authority in such matters and may exercise its own discretion, Congress ventured to pass the act, which held the Department in check so that we might know and might appropriate for whatever was required, not only in building new ships, but in reconstructing old ones.

So it fell out that the Secretary for the first time was confronted very much as a householder is with the question of repairs. The householder sends for an architect, who makes his estimate, and it is never half as much as it is when the bills come in. When the original calculation was made, I am told from the House that nearly every one was inadequate. New estimates, additional estimates, kept coming in afterwards before the House.

Mr. CLAY. With the Senator's permission, on that hangs a very difficult point. Do I understand the Senator to say that since the Navy Department, January 11 last, recommended that $220,000 be appropriated for the purpose of repairing the San Francisco the Department has recommended that the appropriation be increased to $600,000?

Mr. HALE. Yes; I understand just that, and it is a thing that we meet every day. The first estimates that come in are sometimes not half what is needed.

Mr. CLAY. I will say to the Senator——

Mr. HALE. Let me give the Senator an instance.

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. There was one ship that was left out in the original list. For some reason or other it did not get in it at all.

Mr. CLAY. That was the Maine, I reckon.

Mr. HALE. It was the Maine. When the Senate was confronted with the question what it should appropriate for that ship, it said to the Department that it wanted the estimate to cover everything up to the present date and not a part of it. So when we got the estimate of the Maine from the Department, instead of its being as the others, when they were sent in, $200,000 or $300,000, we got everything in, and it came to us complete, at almost $600,000. We put it in because we had all the estimates, instead of coming in from time to time; for after the time when the first calculations are made, as will always happen, additional information comes in. I will say to the Senator I am by no means certain that before another year, when this work is undertaken, as everything is very expensive, we may be called upon for an additional amount in the case of every one of the vessels which are here fully provided for.

The Senator does not appreciate, and I do not wonder that he does not, first, the enormous expense always attendant upon these ships, and, then, the impossibility of being able to make a calculation of what the repairs will amount to. It can not be done exactly any more than in the case of a householder. The estimates keep coming in all the time.

That is all I can say about this matter. I am afraid even this large amount will not be all that we will be called upon for. To repair and to rebuild is one of the necessities which comes from a great naval establishment; but it is on our hands, and we have to pay the bills.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I want to say just a word further. Of course I appreciate all that the Senator from Maine has said, but I must confess, if the Navy Department recommended $200,000 to repair the Brooklyn January 11, 1908, and in less than three months afterwards placed that estimate at $453,000, I do not see how Congress can be guided by the recommendations of the Navy Department.

If the Navy Department January 11, 1908, recommended $350,000 for the repair of the Alabama, and the Alabama is now with our fleet and has not been here since that time, and since that date the Navy Department has recommended $667,500 for the repair of that ship, it is indeed a very serious condition of affairs. If the Navy Department recommended for the repair of all these ships $1,600,000 in January last, and now recommends nearly $6,000,000 for the repair of the same ships, I must confess as a Senator I am unwilling to be guided by the recommendations of the Navy Department.

Where are we standing? We appropriate $100,000,000 every year for the purpose of maintaining our Navy, and we rely upon the information that we receive from the Department to guide us in the expenditures of the public money. If in three months there is a change from a million and a half to $5,000,000 for the purpose of repairing these ships, how can we trust the Navy Department?

Mr. President, this is the first time to my knowledge since I have been a member of the Senate that we have more than trebled the estimates made by any Department. I believe we ought to take this page and we ought to revise it notwithstanding it comes from the House, and fix it in accordance with the estimates made by the Navy Department.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. The first estimate, as your committee understands it, came from the Bureau of Construction and Repair. Subsequent events developed that the Bureau of Engineering had not made any estimate. The life of a boiler is about eight years. We found that new boilers were needed, I think, on the Maine and one or two other ships the names of which have escaped my mind.

Mr. HALE. And there is also the Bureau of Equipment.

Mr. PERKINS. Also there was an estimate made by the Bureau of Equipment. The estimate made by the Bureau of Construction and Repair is correct, and subsequently there was added the estimate of the Engineering Bureau and also the estimate of the Bureau of Equipment.

Mr. CLAY. The report which I read, I will say to the Senator from California, placed the total cost of repairs of the ship I just mentioned at $350,000.

Mr. PERKINS. That is the hull of the ship.

Mr. CLAY. They placed the total cost of repairs on that ship at $350,000. Here is another thing which I have just read. They say here:

> 5. Attention is especially invited to the fact that the above-noted estimates do not require additional appropriations over and above those already covered in the estimates submitted with the Bureau's letter, No. 945–A 121, of September 24, 1907. The estimates already submitted are sufficient to cover such work on the above-noted vessels as can be undertaken during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and the accompanying statement of probable expenditures is submitted in compliance with the specific requirement contained in the act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908.

Mr. PERKINS. What name is signed to that report?

Mr. CLAY. It is from the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. PERKINS. It is a report to the Secretary of the Navy from the chief of one of the bureaus.

Mr. CLAY. Suppose it is from one of the chiefs of bureau through the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. PERKINS. It relates only to his Bureau.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator from California furnish to the Senate an itemized statement from the Navy Department showing why these estimates on the various ships have grown from $200,000 to $450,000? We have the estimates made January 11 last, and if any estimates have been made during the last month or six weeks other than these estimates let us know what they are. Let us know all the items. If after our ships have been commissioned and on the waters three or four years it requires $600,000 to repair one of them, I want to understand why it is.

Mr. President, I am in favor of an efficient navy. An efficient and a strong navy is more important to defend this country than an army. If we are ever attacked at all, it will be from across the waters, and I am not uneasy about it in any way. I am not expecting any war to take place in this country in the next five or six years. I have no patience with such talk.

If we govern properly and treat fairly and justly all the nations of the earth and keep up that high standard of civilization which it is our privilege to enjoy, we will in all probability not engage in war with any of the nations of the earth.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAY. With the Senator's permission, just a word. The civilized nations of the world to-day are preparing to settle their disputes outside of battle. We are gradually gaining ground in favor of the arbitration of all disputes. We are a Christian people, highly educated, that love truth, justice, and right, and there is no probability of this nation being engaged in a war with other countries. I believe that all this war talk that we hear is without the slightest foundation. There is nothing in it; at least I hope there is not.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAY. I do not want to discuss war.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly; but I will yield to the Senator from California first.

Mr. PERKINS. I agree with the Senator from Georgia on the war basis. What I want to do is to answer his criticism on repairs. The life of a ship in the mercantile service and in the Navy is equally the same. It is twenty years. In other words, every prudent merchant shipowner writes off 5 per cent every year of a ship by depreciation in value, and, besides, he has to spend 5 per cent more to keep up the ship to that standard. Now, take a ship costing $4,000,000. Five per cent on that is $200,000. That is the result, and it fully explains the great cost which my friend from Georgia is criticising.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CLAY. With pleasure.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I merely want to ask the Senator a question. I listened to his very eloquent remarks a moment ago. Did this country treat Great Britain justly in 1810–1812?

Mr. CLAY. I think so.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And yet we got into a war there. Did we treat Spain justly and act in the interest of humanity in 1898?

Mr. CLAY. I think so.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And yet we got into a war there.

Mr. CLAY. We did.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. These are two illustrations, and I will ask another. Did we treat Mexico justly in 1846?

Mr. CLAY. I think so.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yet we got into a war there.

Mr. CLAY. I am always on the side of my own country. The Senator has mentioned three wars, and this country is more than 125 years old. I do not want to discuss war now. I want to discuss these items, because they are on my mind. I have not yet been able to understand why these items were inserted in the House.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Just one moment to correct what I know the Senator does not want to go into the RECORD. He said I had mentioned three wars 125 years old. The Spanish war is hardly 125 years old.

Mr. CLAY. No; I did not. I said this country is more than 125 years old.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Of course; I do not dispute that.

Mr. CLAY. I presume I know that the Spanish war is not 125 years old.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Maine in charge of the pending bill has always been able to explain the various items in a bill. I have served on committees with him. He is a very industrious Senator, and so is the Senator from California. I am convinced from the speech the Senator from Maine made that he himself is not satisfied with these items. In fact, if the Senator explained the items satisfactorily, I must confess that I could not understand it. He is always clear and forcible.

Mr. HALE. I can simply repeat that these items did not all come in at once. I do not know the items that they cover. I have not gone over all those, but the first estimates were only the general repairs under one bureau. Afterwards other bureaus were found to require almost as much—the Steam Engineering Bureau and the Equipment Bureau—so that when the Senate committee tackled the bill I had put on a provision the House did not put on before they passed it to the Senate. All the funds were left to come out of the funds of the Bureau of Construction and Repair. The House left the bill in that way.

When it was found that the original estimates were so largely increased by the other bureaus, some being as much as the estimate of the Bureau of Construction and Repair itself, making this great aggregate, the House neglected to provide that the money should be taken out of the funds of these other bureaus. It would not have been right for the Bureau of Construction and Repair to pay all these bills. That was an element of wrong in the appropriation which we had to correct here. That is why I can not explain the details. The Senator says he thinks I am dissatisfied. I wish these items were not so large. But I do not know the items; I do not pretend to know; only I know why it was that the document which the Senator reads from does not measure the necessity of the entire appropriation. The reason is that other estimates came in afterwards.

Mr. CLAY. I wish to say this to the Senator——

Mr. CARTER and Mr. ELKINS addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CLAY. I will yield to the Senator from West Virginia and then I will yield to the Senator from Montana.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair recognized the Senator from Montana. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to that Senator?

Mr. CLAY. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. CARTER. I rise merely to ask the Senator from Georgia a question.

I understand the Senator to take exception, for instance, to the appropriation, on page 60, of $453,000 for the Brooklyn, based upon an estimate made in January, and to inquire why it is that since January the item should have so materially increased in amount. I find in the document here from which the Senator reads that the items when added together make the exact amount of the appropriation as outlined in the document to which the Senator refers, which was printed February 12. On page 3 the Senator will observe that the appropriation for the Brooklyn, general overhauling, and so forth, is estimated at $275,000. By reference to page 5 the Senator will observe that the Bureau of Ordnance fixed the estimates at $53,500 for that Bureau work.

On page 7 the estimate of the Bureau of Equipment for the Brooklyn amounts to $75,000. On page 8 of the document I find the estimate of the Bureau of Steam Engineering for the Brooklyn, $50,000. All these are for the Brooklyn. These items, to wit, $275,000 first referred to, $53,500 referred to in another subdivision, $75,000 for equipment, and $50,000 for steam fitting, make, in the aggregate, the $453,500 mentioned in the bill.

Mr. HALE. All that is in the document?

Mr. CARTER. Entirely in the document.

Mr. HALE. I am very glad the Senator has found it.

Mr. CARTER. All the items are here, but the estimates seem to have been made by the different bureaus covering the particular class of construction coming within their province. The first is the Bureau of Construction, $275,000.

Mr. HALE. That is the original estimate for general overhauling, which caught the eye of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. CARTER. Manifestly the Senator from Georgia believed that that was the amount of repairs required in January. The amount of repairs in January to be performed in that Bureau is identical with the amount for repairs in that Bureau to-day; but the other bureaus make other estimates, and the aggregate of all the estimates appears on page 60 of the bill as an item of $453,000, the sum of all the items.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. ELKINS. I am much interested in the large amounts spoken of by the Senator from Georgia. As I understood him, he said the estimates for some of the ships were made in January and that since January the estimates have been increased enormously. What I want to ask is how they make the estimates? The ships in the fleet are now going around the world, and how can the Department make an estimate for their repair?

Mr. CLAY. I want to call the Senator's attention, in reply to that question, to page 4, paragraph 4, of this report, which says:

4. The Brooklyn and Iowa are not now in active service, but are in reserve. General surveys have been held, but the detailed estimates under the survey have not yet been received.

Still they say how much it will take to repair those ships—

The Alabama, Illinois, Kearsarge, and Kentucky are still in commission and are with the fleet. They can not be surveyed until they are available for the purpose. The estimates for these last-named vessels are therefore approximate and are based on previous experience in the overhauling of similar vessels.

Mr. ELKINS. Does the bill carry an appropriation for the repair of these ships?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly it carries an appropriation for these identical ships I have named.

Mr. ELKINS. I desire to ask the Senator from Georgia another question.

Mr. CLAY. Very well.

Mr. ELKINS. How are we going to make repairs on these great battle ships of the fleet while they are going around the world?

Mr. CLAY. They say they have not been surveyed; that the estimates have not been made. They have since approximately guessed at it on the ground that it usually costs so much to repair ships of that kind.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire, if the fleet is going around the world and it will take another year, as I understand, before it can return and these ships be surveyed, why make appropriations to repair them now?

Mr. CLAY. I think the Senator's inquiry is very pertinent. These ships can not be repaired until they come back here, especially if such an amount of money is to be spent on them.

Mr. CARTER. Why not, if they need repairs?

Mr. CLAY. They can repair them even on the water to some extent. They can make the necessary repairs to keep them going; but I should not think that we would spend half a million dollars in repairing a ship while it was on the ocean. I am not certain about that, but I should not think so. Common sense would indicate that I am correct, though I may be incorrect.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, we might be able to reduce these estimates somewhat if the repairs could be deferred until the return of the fleet, which will be more than a year hence. I can not understand how you can put $600,000 on a ship while it is going around the world. You might put some ordinary repairs on it.

Mr. CLAY. I can not understand that myself.

Mr. ELKINS. I want information as to that.

Mr. CLAY. I think the Senator is correct.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CLAY. I do.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I want to say to my friend from Georgia [Mr. CLAY], bearing out a statement which I previously made, that he was reading only the estimates furnished by the Bureau of Construction and Repair and the Bureau of Equipment. Take the case of the San Francisco, for instance, which the Senator criticised in his forcible manner and very intelligently. The Bureau of Equipment, as to the San Francisco, says:

San Francisco and Baltimore.—Refitting and equipping as mine-laying vessels, including general overhauling of equipment installation, and changes necessary to make the vessels efficient, including work incidental to that under other bureaus, $50,000 each, $100,000.

Now we come down to the Bureau of Engineering, and as to this same vessel, the San Francisco, it estimates:

San Francisco.—General overhauling of machinery, necessary work for conversion of ship into a mine layer, installation of new boilers, and general repairs, $200,000.

Adding those two amounts to the amount which the Senator read makes the sum total which is contained in the bill. The same thing holds good as to the other ships about which the Senator has read from the House document.

Mr. CLAY. With the permission of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], I desire to examine most critically this entire document and the supplemental reports that have been filed. I will do so between now and morning. I hope the Senator does not expect to have this bill passed this evening.

Mr. HALE. I plainly perceive that we shall not be able to pass the bill to-night.

Mr. CLAY. I want to examine the supplemental reports and to examine this entire document, so as to see exactly what has been reported, and to go over the items. I will do that between now and morning. Can the Senator from Maine tell me where I can get the supplemental report? I presume I can obtain it from his committee.

Mr. HALE. The documents the Senator desires are House Document No. 656—I presume that is the one the Senator has—and Senate Document No. 414. The latter document relates only to the Maine.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator tell the Senate when the Maine was commissioned?

Mr. HALE. I do not remember.

Mr. CLAY. It has not been long, surely.

Mr. HALE. It was some time ago.

Mr. CLAY. Some three or four years ago?

Mr. HALE. Not more than that. I should think hardly so long as that—the new Maine.

Mr. CLAY. I mean the new Maine. That item, as I believe, is for five or six hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. HALE. Five hundred and sixty-odd thousand dollars.

I now offer an amendment to the amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine proposes an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 61, line 4, after the word "Congress," it is proposed to insert "and letters of the Secretary of the Navy of April 20, 1908, concerning general repairs to the Maine."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of line 3, on page 65.

Mr. HALE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Maine will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 65, at the end of line 3, it is proposed to strike out the period and insert a comma, and to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That so much of the foregoing appropriation of the current appropriation for steam machinery as may be necessary may be used to complete the machinery of the seagoing tugs Patapsco and Patuxent, now building at the navy-yards at Portsmouth, N. H., and Norfolk, Va.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed, and continued to the bottom of page 68.

Mr. HALE. I offer the amendments which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 69, line 3, after the word "thousand," it is proposed to insert "six hundred," so as to read:

Pay of professors and others, Naval Academy: One professor of physics, $3,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read the next amendment submitted by Mr. HALE, which was, on page 69, line 6, before the word "thousand," to strike out "two" and insert "three;" and in the same line, before the word "dollars," to strike out "five hundred," so as to read:

One professor of mathematics, one of mechanical drawing, one of English, one of French, and one of Spanish, at $3,000 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read the next amendment submitted by Mr. HALE, which was, on page 69, line 8, before the word "hundred," to strike out "two" and insert "six;" and in the same line, before the word "dollars," to insert "and forty," so as to read:

Three professors, namely, one of English, one of French, and one of Spanish, at $2,640 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read the next amendment submitted by Mr. HALE, which was, on page 69, line 10, after the word "thousand," to insert "four hundred," so as to read:

Five instructors, at $2,400 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read the next amendment submitted by Mr. HALE, which was, on page 69, line 11, before the words "thousand," to strike out "one" and insert "two;" in the same line, after the words "thousand," to strike out "eight" and insert "one," and, in the same line, before the word "dollars," to insert "and sixty," so as to read:

Four instructors, at $2,160 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read the next amendment submitted by Mr. HALE, which was, on page 69, line 13, before the word "hundred," to strike out "five" and insert "eight," so as to read:

Ten instructors, at $1,800 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of line 24, on page 71.

Mr. HALE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 71, line 23, before the word "thousand," it is proposed to strike out "thirty-four" and insert

"forty-five," and, in the same line, after the word "thousand," to strike out "six" and insert "one," so as to read:

In all, $145,108.26.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, under the subhead "Naval Academy," on page 71, after line 24, to insert:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to close and balance as expended the sum of $24,500 now standing on the books of the Treasury under the appropriation "Pay of the Navy," which was advanced by direction of the Secretary of the Navy in 1867 and 1868, and has heretofore been used as a midshipmen's store fund at the Naval Academy: Provided, That hereafter the storekeeper at the Naval Academy, authorized by section 1527 of the Revised Statutes, shall render quarterly returns of property to the Chief of the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe. A full report shall be made annually of receipts and expenditures by the Chief of the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts to the Secretary of the Navy: And provided further, That an inspection of the storekeeper's accounts shall be made quarterly by the general inspector of the Pay Corps, with such recommendation as he may deem necessary to the Chief of the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Maine if he will explain the first part of that amendment? I have no doubt it is all right, but it is not clothed in language which enables us to understand what it is. I refer to that part relating to the unexpended sum of $24,500.

Mr. HALE. I would say, generally, the amendment speaks for itself. It is to provide for a better and a more correct accounting from time to time for this fund and for regular reports to be made.

Mr. BACON. I am not referring to that part of it. The amendment refers to the money advanced by the Secretary of the Navy in 1867 and 1868. I supposed that was the fund set apart for the purposes enumerated in the balance of the section, but I was not sure, and for that reason I asked the Senator to explain it.

Mr. HALE. I am going to have read a letter from the Department. The amendment covers the—

Sum of $24,500 now standing on the books of the Treasury under the appropriation "Pay of the Navy," which was advanced by direction of the Secretary of the Navy in 1867 and 1868, and has heretofore been used as a midshipmen's store fund at the Naval Academy.

The fund has been used generally without being accounted for, and the amendment provides for the accounting; but if the Senator desires I will have the letter read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 14, 1908.

SIR: 1. Section 4 of the act of March 2, 1867 (14 Statutes, 516), now section 1527 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, provides that the storekeeper at the Naval Academy shall be detailed from the Paymaster Corps, and shall have authority, with the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, to procure clothing and other necessaries for the midshipmen and cadet engineers in the same manner that supplies are now furnished to the Navy. Prior to the passage of this law a civilian storekeeper provided for the needs of the midshipmen under an arrangement between himself and the officials of the Academy.

2. To give effect to the law above quoted the Chief of the Bureau of Provisions and Clothing, by direction of the Secretary of the Navy, issued instructions to the Superintendent of the Naval Academy, under date of April 18, 1867, directing the paymaster in charge to require $50,000 under head of "Pay of the Navy" as a fund, to be in addition to whatever sum may be paid by the paymaster in charge to the naval storekeeper for his stores, and informing him that should a sum greater than $5,000 be found necessary hereafter it may be increased on application to the Bureau.

3. Under this authority the sum of $24,500 was advanced out of the appropriation "Pay of the Navy, 1867," to Paymaster Gilbert E. Thornton, United States Navy, who had been designated as storekeeper.

4. The Comptroller of the Treasury, under date of October 1, 1887, held that this fund has been used in a manner not authorized by law since 1867 and suggested that Congress be asked to transfer the amount from "Pay of the Navy" to a fund to be designated as a fund for the support of the Naval Academy for the purpose of providing clothing and other necessaries for the use of naval cadets. Since that date the matter has several times been brought to the attention of the Department and to Congress, and, although some years ago a bill was introduced by Senator HALE to legalize the matter as suggested by the Comptroller, no legislative action has yet been taken.

5. The matter has again been brought to the attention of the Comptroller, who holds that, unless the fund now used for the midshipmen's store at the Naval Academy be set aside for that purpose by the authority of Congress, the original amount advanced must be turned into the Treasury to be credited to the appropriation "Pay of the Navy, 1867," and the profits, now amounting to over $30,000, be turned into the Treasury under the head of "Miscellaneous receipts." This action would greatly embarrass the authorities at the Naval Academy, and it is therefore urgently recommended that the following provision be inserted in the naval appropriation bill now under consideration:

"The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to close and balance as expended the sum of $24,500 now standing on the books of the Treasury under the appropriation 'Pay of the Navy,' which was advanced by direction of the Secretary of the Navy in 1867 and 1868 and has heretofore been used as a midshipmen's store fund at the Naval Academy: Provided, That hereafter the storekeeper at the Naval Academy, authorized by section 1527 of the Revised Statutes, shall render quarterly returns of property to the Chief of Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe. A full report shall be made annually of receipts and expenditures by the Chief of the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts to the Secretary of the Navy: And provided further, That an inspection of the storekeeper's accounts shall be made quarterly by the general inspector of the Pay Corps, with such recommendation as he may deem necessary, to the Chief of the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts."

6. This provision, if enacted into law, would involve no appropriation, but would merely authorize the continuance of a practice of forty years, which has added greatly to the efficiency of the Academy and to the comfort and economy of the midshipmen. As above stated, the surplus now amounts to over $30,000, and under the provisions of the above mentioned clause, the whole capital of the midshipmen's store would be carefully accounted for and could be turned into the Treasury at any time that Congress might direct.

Respectfully,

TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY,
Acting Secretary.

CHAIRMAN OF THE NAVAL COMMITTEE UNITED STATES SENATE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 72, after line 19, to insert:

Navy bands or members thereof shall not receive remuneration for furnishing music outside the limits of military posts, when the furnishing of such music places them in competition with local civilian musicians.

Mr. DICK. Mr. President, I should like to have that amendment passed over, as I desire to speak briefly upon it so far as it refers to the band at the Naval Academy.

Mr. HALE. I am entirely willing that that shall be done.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over.

Mr. HALE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 75, line 16, it is proposed to strike out "$609,713" and insert $721,713: Provided, That so much of the foregoing appropriation as is needed to pay the additional officers of the Marine Corps provided for in this act shall be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 76, line 14, it is proposed to strike out "one million nine hundred and thirty-five thousand dollars" and insert:

two million one hundred and two thousand six hundred and eight dollars: Provided, That so much of the foregoing appropriation as is needed to pay the additional enlisted men of the Marine Corps provided for in this act shall be immediately available.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, under the subhead "Marine Corps," on page 76, after line 22, to insert:

That from and after the passage of this act, and in order to further increase the efficiency of the United States Marine Corps, the following additional officers, noncommissioned officers, drummers, trumpeters, and privates to those now provided by law for said corps are hereby authorized and directed, namely: One major-general commandant, in lieu of the present brigadier-general commandant; 1 lieutenant-colonel; 2 majors; 18 captains; 7 first lieutenants; 14 second lieutenants; 1 assistant adjutant and inspector, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel; 1 assistant quartermaster, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel; 1 assistant quartermaster, with the rank of major; and 3 assistant quartermasters, with the rank of captain; 1 assistant paymaster, with the rank of major; 1 assistant paymaster, with the rank of captain; 2 sergeant-majors; 15 quartermaster-sergeants, 5 of whom are to serve in the pay department; 20 first sergeants; 50 sergeants; 125 corporals; 10 drummers; 10 trumpeters; and 518 privates: Provided, That hereafter the number of enlisted men in the United States Marine Corps shall be such as the Congress may from time to time authorize.

That the vacancies now existing in the line and staff departments of the United States Marine Corps and those created by this act shall be filled in the manner provided by law.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I observe that this amendment provides for the addition of about a regiment of marines. I want to ask the Senator if there is any increase in the number of enlisted men in the Navy provided for in this bill?

Mr. HALE. Yes; 6,000 men. The Department asked for just double the number that has been given for the Marine Corps, but the committee was not ready to grant that much, and merely increased the number so that the Marine Corps might have a corresponding increase with the increase in the Navy. We gave them half of what they asked.

Mr. WARREN. I want to call the attention of the Senator and of the Senate to the fact that there seems to have been a feeling of resentment and opposition here in the Senate, on the part of some, to any enlargement of the Army. It has gone to such an extent that newspaper items and newspaper writers have been made the texts for rather extensive debate, and on a morning not long ago, after the passage of the regular annual Army appropriation bill, that bill was recalled and held up for a time on a motion to reconsider. The extravagancies of the appropriations for war and for the prevention of war were portrayed, and the fact that the Army bill had contained a very large addition, made by the Senate committee, was brought out.

Mr. President, that bill did not contain any increase in the number of enlisted men or officers. When a proposition for an increase of the Army is made the Military Committee brings a bill onto this floor and asks the Senate to consider it separately from an appropriation bill, which necessarily must be hurriedly considered along toward the last days of the session.

We have had in the recent past a bill respecting the Medical Corps of the Army and a bill respecting the Ordnance Corps, both of which have been thrashed out on the floor during two or three sessions of Congress, and have been contended against by the Senator who now has charge of this bill, and others, and when they were finally settled they were settled on their merits by themselves. The same holds true as to the act increasing the Artillery Corps.

I believe the Senator from Maine is right in proposing an increase of the enlisted force of the Navy and an increase of the enlisted force of the Marine Corps, but it ought not to be done in this way, as it is technically against rule and reason to thus legislate in our supply bills. I shall support the Senator in this amendment, but I register a protest against further legislation of this kind in this way.

Mr. HALE. The Senator understands there would not be the slightest necessity for any increase if we were not adding ships all the time. That is not true about the Army. We are all the time building new ships.

Mr. WARREN. We have been adding new countries, however.

Mr. HALE. Not lately.

Mr. WARREN. Not very lately.

Mr. HALE. That is the reason why we have increased the Navy. I have no antagonism toward the Army or toward the bills to which the Senator refers. I gave up my opposition long ago.

Mr. WARREN. Nevertheless, Mr. President, we had an aftermath in which the Senator engaged the day after the passage of the Army appropriation bill of some hours' extent, in which the Secretary of War was charged with a desire to increase the Army to 125,000 men.

Mr. HALE. I said I hoped the Secretary was not responsible for that. I have learned since that he was not.

Mr. WARREN. I said at the time that I did not believe he was responsible for the yarn. At least he had kept me at such a distance that even as chairman of the Military Committee I never had heard even a hint that he desired to increase the Regular Army to 125,000 men. The Secretary of War was discovered on the evening of the day of that debate at Council Bluffs and responded at once to an inquiry from the Associated Press. As what he said is very short, I think I will send it to the desk and have it read, so that we can understand about this great bugaboo of an Army which is going to eat up the entire revenues of the United States; that is to say, what is left after paying for the battle ships and paying other Navy Department expenses.

Mr. HALE. There will not be much left.

Mr. WARREN. I think so myself. The difference, Mr. President, between the Army and the Navy is that while a regiment of infantry may cost a million dollars per year, a battle ship costs $10,000,000 first cost, then a million dollars a year for depreciation and repairs, and also a regiment or more of men at a cost of over another million per year to equip it for service. I now have here the item I refer to, the interview of Secretary Taft.

Mr. HALE. I saw the item and was very glad to see that the Secretary declared he was not responsible for the article, and I said when I brought the matter before the Senate that I did not believe the article was inspired; that I did not believe the Secretary was behind it. I was not aiming in what I said at the Secretary of War in any way. I wanted to call attention to what I believed was the general extravagance in military expenditures and was in a way preparing for the contest that I thought might come up about the big battle-ship programme in the Senate, and so far as that goes I accomplished the object.

But as I say, I was very glad to see that the Secretary of War did not inspire the article by that correspondent, and for a time we heard very little, the Senator noticed, of that correspondent. But I see he has now resumed his statements and prophecies, and if it turns out they have no more basis than the other, and that he does not speak ex cathedra, they will go for what they are worth. The Senator has had some experience with correspondents.

Mr. WARREN. I have had; and I do the Senator from Maine the justice to say that in inveighing against the Army on that particular occasion he did not neglect to lambast the Navy and its expenditures to some extent as well.

Mr. HALE. I was thinking more of the Navy than I was——

Mr. WARREN. But speaking of newspapers and of the fact that we spent two or three hours here in animated debate over a newspaper article, shivering with fear because of the expense of an army of 125,000, notwithstanding that I, in a feeble way, stated that I had no confidence in it and would not support such a move, yet nearly all the metropolitan newspapers have since been filled with statements to the effect that we were going to have an army of 125,000, but for the fact that the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] had valiantly attacked the scheme and had probably pricked the bubble.

So, Mr. President, I desire to have read what the Secretary said when his attention was directed to the matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Washington Post, April 8, 1908.]

COUNCIL BLUFFS, IOWA, April 7.

Secretary Taft was to-night shown a report of the Senate proceedings, wherein Senator HALE discussed increased appropriations for the Army. He read it with keen interest.

"I certainly have no knowledge of who wrote the article in the Washington paper referred to by Senator HALE," said the Secretary, "nor of its contents. It was not inspired by any person officially connected with the War Department."

Mr. WARREN. So much for the Secretary of War. In the same debate it was stated that the Chief of Staff believed in an army of 125,000 men. I should like to have read what is between the two marks on the letter I send to the desk. I wish to take only a little time.

The Secretary read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF,
Washington, April 10, 1908.

Hon. FRANCIS E. WARREN, United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR:

* * * * * * *

If the article was inspired by anyone—

Mr. WARREN. It refers to the article of the correspondent whom the Senator from Maine has already referred to.

Mr. HALE. Mr. O'Laughlin.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

The Secretary read as follows:

If the article was inspired by anyone, I have no knowledge thereof, but judging from the fact that most of the data contained therein was evidently taken from a public document published by Congress, it is apparent that the author needed no inspiration. It is true that the Secretary of War has taken under consideration and studied from time to time numerous propositions concerning needed changes in the present organization of the Army, and has arrived at the conclusion that some increase is needed by certain portions thereof and that most of it needs reorganization to enable it to be thoroughly efficient when called on in an emergency. It is not true, so far as I know, that he has ever contemplated or concluded it advisable to increase the Army to 125,000 men in time of peace. He has never concealed his views concerning the needs of the Army and may possibly have mentioned them to newspaper correspondents, who seek information from him as they do from all public men. In fact, he set forth quite fully his views in an address delivered by him in Columbus, Ohio, on April 2, to the board of trade of that city. Nothing can be found in that address indicating that he contemplates increasing the Army to 125,000 men in peace. In fact, if there is anyone who has ever contemplated such a thing, I have never heard of it.

I have never even thought of "doubling" the Army, much less suggested or advocated it to anyone. So far as I know, neither the General Staff nor anyone in my office has ever done so either.

* * * * * * *

Very sincerely, yours,

J. F. BELL,
Major-General, Chief of Staff.

Mr. WARREN. Perhaps it would be well to call another witness, Mr. John Callan O'Laughlin himself. I have had no communication whatever with him, except to receive the letter, a copy of which I send to the desk and request the Secretary to read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

HIBBS BUILDING,
Washington, D. C., April 8, 1908.

Hon. FRANCIS E. WARREN, United States Senate,
Chairman of the Military Committee of the Senate.

SIR: In view of the debate which occurred in the Senate regarding an article I wrote for the Washington Post, I trust you will not consider it amiss to permit me to confirm your statement that the publication was not inspired by Secretary Taft or anyone else. Indeed, in justice to the Secretary, I must say that I have not discussed the matter with him, and what I wrote was based upon information which reached me through other channels. Moreover, as I stated in the article in question, the plan of reorganization was merely under consideration and there was no finality as to what would be done or as to the size of the increase which eventually would be considered desirable by the War Department.

I have no objection whatever to your use of this letter in any way that you may see fit.

I have the honor to be, sir,

Very respectfully, JOHN CALLAN O'LAUGHLIN.

Mr. WARREN. It will be remembered that the remarks which were made upon that day were largely predicated upon this newspaper article, and if the denial on this floor had been sufficient, or if my assurance that I did not stand, or the members of the committee who are associated with me did not stand for such an increase, had been sufficient, I should not have brought the matter in here to-day. But I am still and continually seeing it in the newspapers, and it looks very much as if in order to get four or six or ten battle ships and a larger Navy, that the water must be blackened around the expense of the Navy so as to obscure it from view while the Navy is increased enormously from time to time, and meanwhile we give the Army very little consideration.

In justice to the Senator from Maine, I should say that his remarks the other morning applied as much, perhaps, to the Navy as to the Army, but the difference is that the Military Committee and those who represent the Army on this floor hold it down as to size and appropriation therefor as closely as they can in committee and present measures here in itemized detail which show where every dollar goes, and if we want to increase the Army we bring the bills in separately and ask that they be considered separately in both Houses.

On the other hand, in the treatment of legislation and appropriations for the Navy it is entirely different. Every year the Senator from Maine, chairman of the Naval Committee, is called upon to receive this Navy appropriation bill from the House at a very late day in the session, when engaged in his duties on the general Appropriations Committee on other bills. It is crowded in. Large amounts are put in two or three paragraphs, and we are called upon to give just exactly what is asked by the Executive or by the House, or, I might almost say, by any amendment that may be offered on the floor, without due consideration thereof by members of this Senate.

It seems to me that we ought to know something about the next naval bill. When the Senator from Colorado said the other day, with that frankness which always characterizes him, that he was not aware that the President had made the rate of pay for the enlisted men of the Navy all these years, and upon investigation it was learned that that had been the law since 1814, I think we ought from that to take notice and to understand that we have been legislating largely and altogether too much in the dark.

I do not believe the Senator in charge of this bill will claim that he thinks an annual appropriation bill is the proper place to add legislation providing for a regiment of enlisted men and 6,000 seamen. Here is given in great detail the different officers of this corps: The major-general, the lieutenant-colonels, which under the proposed new law will get $4,800 apiece, the majors, captains, lieutenants, sergeants, corporals, and so forth. Here are all the officers from major-general down; and the corporals, of which there are a hundred and twenty-five; a sufficient number of privates, and so forth. I assume they are all needed and I will vote with the Senators for them.

But I want to say that this corps is simply infantry. It is an addition to the Army, which has been so described. The only difference is that they are more generally used on shore near points where the Navy may be situated with its naval bases and its supplies. They receive the same pay and the same designation as Army officers and are really infantry. We add that much to the Army, only we add it under the cloak of the Navy. I think they are necessary, but let us admit frankly it is an increase of our fighting force.

So far as the Army is concerned, while we would oppose as strongly as would the Senator from Maine or any other Senator any proposal to now in peace provide for a regular army of a hundred and twenty-five thousand men, yet we must increase slightly, in my judgment, certain corps. For instance, there is the Signal Corps. Inventions, improvements that have been made, and the experience that has been had in late wars, have taught us that we must have as a matter of economy and as a matter of efficiency a larger Signal Corps. I expect to ask the Senate to consider the addition of a few men, not as many perhaps as are given here in a mere paragraph of this appropriation bill which we pass in a minute or so. I expect to take time to have the Signal Corps matter duly considered.

There is only one other project of increase enacted upon before the committee, and that is to add a service corps of noncommissioned officers and privates in the departments of quartermaster, commissary, and so forth, throughout the country. So far as I know, that is all that is contemplated in the way of an increase of the Army in the near future.

The Senator from Maine very generously assisted me and those upon my committee in providing for the raise of the pay of the Army. But even in that case we brought the pay bill and the whole matter on the floor first by itself in order to get, in a deliberate and orderly way under the rules, the Senate's consent. The Senator from Maine was not able to do this in the case of the Navy for reasons which are all known. But it does seem to me that if we want to add 6,000 seamen and to add a thousand or so of men to the Marine Corps, a matter of 7,000 men, we might expect the assistance of such men as the Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from New Hampshire, who were so much ruffled by the fake 125,000 men story on Secretary Taft, and who so much feared that we were going to be run over with an extensive army the other morning because a newspaper man told a nice story in order to increase the circulation of the periodical by which he is employed—to help the Senate out at this juncture—and at least register some mild reproach against this new debauchery of militarism, sprung upon us without notice in a regular annual supply bill, an appropriation bill which must as a matter of course be passed.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I think in view of what has been said on this subject the exact language employed by Secretary Taft should be read to the Senate. I send to the desk a complete report of the speech made by Secretary Taft at Columbus on the night of April 2, before the Columbus Board of Trade, and ask the clerk to read the paragraph I have marked, which bears upon this subject.

Mr. WARREN. I have no objection whatever to the entire speech being put into the RECORD. I have not read it, but I submit I would not like to have a paragraph from a speech of mine inserted unless the whole speech was also published.

Mr. FORAKER. I will ask that the whole speech may be inserted in the RECORD, but that the paragraph I have marked may be read first.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Ohio State Journal, Friday morning, April 3, 1908.]

A bill is now pending in Congress also authorizing the employment upon a small stipend for a drill every two years of men who have served in the Regular Army and been discharged, as a reserve corps out of which the Regular Army could be enlarged at once in case war were declared or threatened. This would enable us to increase the Regular Army to 150,000 men without great difficulty, and would secure us 250,000 well-equipped, well-drilled soldiers of the Republic. This plan for a small army capable of rapid expansion is perfected, but not carried out fully into legislation. I am glad to say, however, that Congress manifests such an interest in the development of the Army and a willingness from time to time to improve the various branches that during the next decade I feel confident that we shall soon have a Regular Army and a reserve citizen soldiery sufficient to put into the field 250,000 men capable of carrying on war with courage and efficiency.

Of course in the support of such an Army the Republic is subjected to very heavy expense, because the whole Army, both Regular, militia, and volunteers, are volunteers and must receive compensation sufficient to enable them to live and support somebody beside themselves. We do not raise the armies by conscription, except in the very last resort. As a consequence our armies are vastly much more expensive than the European armies even in time of peace. Our Regular Army to-day of 60,000 men costs about $72,000,000 a year. France maintains an army of 546,000 men, and it costs her $133,000,000 a year. Germany maintains an army of 646,000 men, and it costs her $144,000,000 a year.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, it will be seen by anyone who reads that carefully that the idea in the mind of the Secretary, in so far as he has given any expression of which I am aware, is that there should be such legislation as will enable us during the next ten years, through the agency of a reserve force as well as the active Army, to provide a force of 250,000 men. It is not his idea, as I understand, that we should raise the Army to 250,000 men immediately or to 125,000 men immediately, but that all that is merely in prospect. It is a sort of plan or programme which he has in his mind. As the Senator from Wyoming has suggested that is only a part of his speech, and inasmuch as it is only part of an extended speech on that subject, I agree with the Senator from Wyoming that the whole speech should properly go into the RECORD, and I ask that it all may be incorporated.

Mr. WARREN. I did not ask that it should all go in because of the fact that the Senator asked to have only a part read. It was simply that those who read the RECORD may have the whole speech before them.

Mr. FORAKER. I understand. I think everyone who reads the RECORD ought to have the benefit of the whole speech.

Mr. WARREN. While I have not read the speech, that part just read at the desk indicates that the Secretary feels exactly as I assumed he did and as he has often expressed himself. The Army is large enough at present, with one or two additions, possibly a thousand or two thousand men, but that we should have a National Guard sufficiently provided so that we could have on short notice an army of 125,000 men if needed, and if we went into real war, still an additional number near at hand provided through the militia forces of the different States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the entire speech will be printed in the RECORD.

The speech of Secretary Taft is as follows:

I am always glad to visit this central and capital city of Ohio, where the governor executes, the legislature legislates, and the steady growth of this enterprising community measures the progress of our great State. The last time I had the honor of addressing an audience in this city was in this very hall in the heated days of August of last year, the memory of which still makes my heart beat in sympathy for those unfortunates who were subjected to a Turkish bath of an hour and three-quarters' duration. I promise to inflict upon the present audience no such cruel and unusual punishment.

I have selected for a topic to-night an institution in this country which I think has too little popular consideration and attention in time of peace. I refer to the Army of the United States. The Navy is a favorite of the people, whether they belong to the web-footed class that go down to the sea in ships, or inhabit the Mississippi Valley, or live upon the Rocky Mountain Range. There is something about the concrete strength of a great battle ship and the simplicity and courage of the sailor man behind the gun representing us in all parts of the world, and coming into contrast with the ships and sailors of other countries, that appeals to the imagination of the American people. They take the blue jackets into their arms with affection, and no appropriation necessary for the increase and perfection of the Navy seems unreasonable. I am glad that this is so, because I should be the last to detract from the importance of maintaining and increasing the Navy, and am a great admirer of the efficiency and esprit of its blue jackets and marines. But what I wish to plead for to-night is that the boys in khaki and blue of the Regular Army are just as much entitled to the kindly feeling and high interest of the American people as the sailors of the Navy, and that the work they have done and are doing and may have to do in the future is of just as great importance as any that the Navy has done, is doing, or will have to do. The functions which the Navy performs is perhaps a bit more spectacular than that of the Army, and that of itself explains perhaps the difference in the popular attitude toward the two services.

IN THE PHILIPPINES.

Take the battle of Manila Bay, and the operations which followed it. The glory which the Navy properly received from its accomplishment upon that May morning far exceeded anything that was accorded to the Army's arduous and delicate work which it carried on in the four years succeeding for the pacification of the Philippine Islands, and bringing them into a condition in which the benevolent policy of McKinley could be carried out successfully.

The detailed history of the instances of courage, privation, patience, and patriotic devotion to our national policy in the islands, exhibited by the officers and enlisted men of the Army, which will do justice to them, can never be written, first, because an adequate record of it does not exist; and, second, because it can only be known to the people of the United States through results, and not through such a triumphant and dramatic picture as that we all like to dwell upon of the epoch-making naval victory off Cavite.

The naval action is usually affirmative. To be useful it must strike, and this makes its function dramatic and commands the popular attention. The function of the Army of late years has generally been that of accomplishment by patient effort, stretching sometimes over months and years, but always requiring close attention, tenacious courage, and self-restraint. Its work has been not only that of attack, but more often and longer that of police administration and pacification.

Take its work in San Francisco. Could anything be more commendable than the maintenance of order by the Army through that stricken city, shaken by the earthquake, destroyed by fire, and about to be exposed to the awful violence of mob and riot, when, under the inspiration of the 2 o'clock courage of Funston, its control passed into the hands of the Regular Army, and thereafter theft and rapine and violence were banished by the long, faithful hours of the regular soldiers on guard?

SERVE IN CUBA.

Take the instance of Cuba. The formidable naval fleet came first and gave to the hands of those seeking peace the effective power to command it; but in a short two weeks to the Army fell the task of garrisoning the island in such a way as to discourage lawlessness and encourage the friends of order. I ask you, Has anything been finer in the history of the Army than the way in which our 5,000 men have settled down in an alien country like Cuba, have secured the maintenance of peace and order without the slightest complaint that any officer or soldier has exhibited any lack of respect for the feelings of the Cubans under the trying circumstances of our occupation, or any lack of tact in carrying out the difficult task assigned to them? But such work, made up of an infinity of little things and proving a constant and uniform self-restraint, appreciation of the situation and commendable military discipline, does not strike the popular imagination and is not apt to call forth the admiration and gratitude of the country whose servants and representatives those soldiers are.

Then, too, the Navy is removed from contact with the people. It is flying a flag in foreign waters. It rarely, if ever, has to exercise any authority in domestic troubles. There is an indefinite, elusive, but influential impression in the minds of many that there is something in a regular army inconsistent with the purposes of a republic. It derives its force from the uses to which regular or standing armies have been put in maintaining governments over oppressed and helpless people. The election of an emperor by the Prætorian Guard, the suppression of a parliament by the army under Cromwell, and the many other instances in history in which the will of the people has been defeated by the trained soldiery of a tyrant, are used to point the moral that in a government of the people, by the people, and for the people, a standing army should be looked upon with suspicion and reduced to the lowest number. It is doubtless true that the enlargement of popular influence in all governments has exercised a beneficent influence to reduce the probability of war.

Still there have been many wars in this country, and not a few of them have proceeded from the popular desire without encouragement by Government authority. Making every concession, therefore, which history justifies in favor of the peaceful character and tendency of a republic, he is a very unwise statesman who urges upon the people a policy reducing the efficiency and size of the Army so as to make the country utterly helpless should emergencies arise, which it is entirely reasonable to anticipate.

We need an army for three purposes. First, as essential to any satisfactory system of national defense; second, as an indispensable instrument in carrying out our established international policy; and third, the suppression of insurrection and civil strife.

In his farewell address Washington advised his countrymen to remember "that timely disbursements to prepare for danger frequently prevented much greater disbursements to repel it," and also advised them to take "care always to keep themselves, by suitable establishments, in a respectable defensive posture."

John Adams, Washington's successor as President, said that "the national defense is the cardinal duty of a statesman."

Secondly, we have taken the position with respect to the republics established in this country, in Central and South America and the West Indies which is approved by both the great national parties and which has been repeatedly announced as the policy of the Government by various Presidents and Secretaries of State. I allude to the Monroe doctrine. There are differences of opinion as to what this doctrine includes, and as to how and with what limitations it ought to be stated. Speaking generally, however, it is an assertion on the part of the United States to the European and other powers of the world that no interference with the Central and South American and West Indies governments by a European power will be permitted which shall have for its object and result the acquisition by a European power of the territory of such nations for colonization or territorial aggrandizement.

This is not a doctrine sustained by any principle of international law; it is a governmental policy which this Government believes to be essential for its own interests and well for the interests of the countries whose integrity it protects. Whatever the motive, whatever the purpose, the assertion involved must rest for its sanction, not upon the international law acquiesced in by all civilized nations, but rather upon the power to enforce it of the nation which asserts it. By virtue of this doctrine we, in effect and for defensive purposes, extend the frontiers of the United States far beyond the actual confines of our territory, to Central America and the islands of the Gulf of Mexico and the Caribbean, to the mouths of the Orinoco and the Amazon, to Magellan and Tierra del Fuego. As we assume the right, so we must undertake the responsibility of measures for the defense of those boundaries whenever, for the purpose of disturbing the integrity of any of the many nations thus included, a foreign force shall invade their borders. How could we maintain such a doctrine if it should ever be questioned in the strenuous race for trade and for colonization that now is rife among the European powers? Could we do it otherwise than by an expeditionary force to the country invaded for the purpose of assisting the local force in repelling the invader? It is true that our Navy, enlarged as it is, would discharge a most useful function in the defense of the invaded country, but it could make but little headway against hostile forces landed therein, and after that the only method of asserting our international policy would be by the use of the Army of the United States.

Third. Of course there is no probability of a recurrence of a great civil war, but should the forces of anarchy and socialism and revolt against organized government manifest themselves, a well-organized militia would be most necessary. The suppression of local disturbances is to the Regular Army a very unpleasant duty, and it is one to which the President would summon Regular troops with great reluctance. An increase in the efficiency of the militia, which we may anticipate, may well relieve the Regular Army of any such duty. The moral effect of a regular army, however, to discourage lawlessness, is valuable.

The history of this country since the beginning of the Revolutionary war shows that during at least one-fourth of the life of the country the Government has had a war on its hands in some part of its territory. It is therefore most unwise to prophesy as to what may happen in this respect in the future. The people of this country, down to the time of the Spanish war, had pursued a policy utterly ignoring the lessons of the past. Through national parsimony and the prejudice against the efficiency of the Army and the making of proper plans for the organization of national volunteers and the drill and mobilization of the militia, we have in times past incurred great losses of life and the expenditure of immense treasure, a large part of both of which might have been avoided had the proper and economical measures been adopted for the maintenance of a small but efficient regular army and a suitable force of militia.

This was true of the war of 1812, of the great civil war, and of the Spanish war.

There is a popular feeling that an army in time of peace is not maintained and administered to be used for war and that the Army exists merely for show, like the mace which is carried before the speaker of the House of Commons, or the truncheon of a field marshal, or the scepter of a king. This impression has led a usually practical and hard-headed people like the Americans to the most absurd military policy. An army is for war. If there were no possibility of war, foreign or domestic, and we could be guaranteed a continuous peace, we should disband the Army; but we have not arrived at this happy condition. We have not yet reached a point in the progress of civilization when war and the fear of war do not play a large part in determining the policies of governments. The voice of the United States in favor of international justice will be much more weighty if it is known to have a good army and a good navy to enforce its views and defend its rights.

Now, it is a fact that time is indispensable to the making of good soldiers and a good army. Our own experience should prevent us from entertaining any illusion as to the inefficiency of a brave but unorganized people to grapple successfully with another nation equally brave but better organized. We have great confidence in ourselves and in our power of quickly adapting circumstances to meet any national emergency. But this should not make us deliberately blind to the most obvious military principles. We should not be misled by the good luck which has attended us in most of our wars. The most insidious argument against the maintenance of an army of present efficiency is that we once had a magnificent army of volunteers of a million men, the flower of which marched down Pennsylvania avenue in the grand review under Grant and Sherman; and it is asked, "Can we not raise such an army again?"

The awful sacrifice of life and money which we had to undergo during the four years in order to train this great army is forgotten, and the country is lulled into the utterly unfounded assurance that a volunteer enlisted to-day or a militiaman enrolled to-morrow can in a week or a month be made an effective soldier. There are no better officers, no better men in any army than we can raise in America. We are a warlike people. Most privates have an independence and a self-reliance that fit them to adapt themselves to different situations, and there are no braver men. But they must know how to shoot straight, they must know how to move at the word of command, they must understand all the duties of a soldier, which grow more complicated with modern guns and modern methods. They can not know it intuitively. We have no right as a nation to ask our citizens to expose themselves as enlisted men in battle without reducing the chances of disaster and death by proper military education of the officers and proper military training of the men.

I am glad to say that our experiences in the Spanish and Philippine wars have had a most healthy effect upon Congress and the people at large with reference to the preparation for our national defense. After the civil war we rapidly reduced our armament, our Navy, and our Army. Our Navy was a collection of wooden frigates and gunboats that could not stand for a minute before the newly invented high-power guns, and our coasts, though lined with the old-fashioned forts, were utterly defenseless against European navies. Our Army was reduced to 25,000 men, smaller in proportion to the population than ever in the history of the country. Slowly but reluctantly in the eighties we took up the project of a new navy, of new coast defenses, but the Army was still continued until the Spanish war at 25,000 men.

In the latter part of Mr. Cleveland's Administration we asserted the Monroe doctrine with as much emphasis and what might almost be called "truculence" as ever in our history, and asserted it against the greatest naval power of the world. On the very day when Mr. Cleveland's message went into Congress demanding arbitration as to the Venezuelan boundary there was just one modern gun mounted on our whole Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts.

Since then, and under the stress of the Spanish war, we have greatly increased our coast defenses, so that now they are very respectable, both on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, although they are by no means completed. Since then we have constructed a navy that in point of efficiency is perhaps equal to any except that of Great Britain. Since then we have taken progressive steps toward the organization of a regular army, which is to-day much more efficient than ever in our past and is much more capable of expansion and efficient addition. But much remains to be done. If I may trespass on your patience a while longer, I should like to invite your attention to the character of the present Army, its size, and its capacity for expansion, together with needed measures to increase the possibility of its being made adequate and useful in time of war.

The change in the Army, its improvement, and adaptation to modern needs are largely due to the ability, energy, deep interest, and enthusiasm and well-directed effort of Elihu Root, Secretary of War under McKinley and Theodore Roosevelt. The legislation under which it is now maintained was almost all of it drafted and pressed upon Congress by that distinguished statesman. Such legislation as has been adopted since he laid down his office is only corollary to that which he had recommended and put through, suggested by actual experience under his new system.

The Regular Army of the United States to-day is limited in number of enlisted men to 100,000, exclusive of the Hospital Corps men. There is authority given the President to enlist upward of 50,000 infantry, 18,000 cavalry, 20,000 Coast Artillery, 6,000 field artillery, and enlisted men of the Signal Corps, the Engineer Corps, the Ordnance Corps, and the other subsidiary corps, together with 12,000 Philippine Scouts, who are a part of the Regular Army, to make that number about 114,000 men. But this right to increase the number of enlisted men in all the different corps is limited by the superior restriction that altogether they shall not exceed 100,000 men. Of course the power of the President to enlist this number of men is subject to the further limitation that Congress may withhold appropriations to pay more than a certain number, so that while he might temporarily increase the force, his power would practically soon be at an end on the failure of Congress to approve such an increase by withholding the necessary money with which to pay them in the future. The number of men and officers actually authorized by order of the President in the aggregate is, in round numbers, 76,000 men, while the number of officers and men actually in the Army does not reach 60,000. The reason for this difference between the number authorized and those actually in service in the Army is the difficulty that we have had in recruiting. The enlisted men to-day receive the same pay which they received in 1861, to wit, $13 a month. This is not enough to attract him, although, of course, it does not at all measure the actual compensation which he receives, because he is fed and well clothed and well housed. Still there ought to be an increase over the wages which were received by him thirty years ago.

A still greater defect in the present system of compensation in the Army is the failure to pay the noncommissioned officers, the sergeants and corporals, a sufficient salary to make them permanent members of the Army. They are, in a sense, the disciplinary backbone of the Army. They are the ones who whip the recruits into service and make good soldiers of them. They are the ones who come much more intimately into contact with the men than do the commissioned officers, and their pay should be made much nearer to that of the commissioned officers than it is to-day. I am glad to say that a bill is now pending in the House, which has passed the Senate, giving an adequate increase in the pay of the enlisted men of the different branches of the Army, which I hope and believe will relieve us greatly in the matter of our recruiting and enable us to fill up the Army to the quota authorized by the President. We are striving in every way to remove from the life of the private soldier those features of it which tend to discourage reenlistment, and with the increased pay we hope that we may make the life of an enlisted man a comparatively attractive one.

In order to properly discuss the Army, we should divide it into two forces, the mobile and the immobile army. The mobile army is that which may be sent into any part of the United States or of the world as an expeditionary force. It consists of the infantry, the cavalry, the field artillery, the engineers, and the Signal Corps, with a suitable part of the Hospital Corps, and it is divided into tactical units—regiments brigades, divisions, and army corps. The immobile army is the Coast Artillery, the duty of which is confined to manning the guns of the coast defenses and operating submarine mines, torpedoes, searchlights, and power plants used in connection with the defenses of all fortified harbors of the United States. The authorized force of the Coast Artillery is, in round numbers, 20,000. Of this 5,000 are necessary to operate the submarine mines, torpedoes, searchlights, and power plants. This leaves but a little over 14,000 for the manning of all guns now mounted in the fortifications of the entire country.

In order to man these guns with one shift of men, there are required 37,000 enlisted men, so that the maximum number of men authorized to-day available for manning guns would be about 4,000 less than one-half of a complete manning detail. When our coast defenses are completed as they are now projected, both in this country and in our insular possessions, and at Panama, the number of men required for one complete manning detail for both the mines, searchlights, power plants, and guns will be 55,000. In war this would have to be considerably increased, because one detail would hardly be enough. As it is, under existing circumstances we have only 20,000, where we need 37,000 for a complete detail. It is now proposed and seems to be practicable to make up the deficit in this manning detail by training a militia coast artillery to man the guns of the coast defenses. The idea has been suggested to the State authorities, and in many of the States along the coast militia companies have been organized for this purpose. It offers an opportunity for service to men who do not wish to go far from their homes, and yet who would be glad to be enrolled in the ranks of the defenders of their country when she is in danger and are willing to devote the necessary month or six weeks of each year to the training necessary to render them efficient for the purpose. In time of war they might be willing to enlist in the regular Coast Artillery during the war, and thus make up the regular detail which is essential to the effectiveness of our coast defenses. Taking away 20,000 from the authorized strength of the Army for the immobile force, it leaves 55,000 as a mobile army under the present quota authorized by the President, or 80,000 for a mobile army if the President were to increase the authority to enlist to 100,000 men. There are thirty regiments of infantry, fifteen regiments of cavalry, six regiments of field artillery, two regiments of engineers, and two regiments of the Signal Corps. This by no means represents the proper proportion for an army in the field. For an army in the field the cavalry ought not to exceed 10 per cent of the total force, of which the infantry will represent more than 80 per cent. It will be necessary to amend the law distributing the cavalry so as to double the number of cavalry regiments and reduce each regiment to six troops instead of twelve, as now constituted, because in no army in the world but ours does the regiment of cavalry have more than six troops. Most of them have but five.

The drain upon the Army by sending 5,000 troops to Cuba and 12,000 troops to the Philippines, is such that there must be an increase in the infantry regiments. Whether this shall involve an increase in the actual number of infantry or only divide them into more regiments is a question which it is not necessary at present to discuss. But certainly there ought to be more regiments of infantry in view of the constant necessity for changing their tours of duty from the United States to the Philippines and from the United States to Cuba.

The separation of the Coast Artillery from the field artillery, effected by the law of last year, has been a move in the right direction and a great improvement. There was no logical connection between the duties of those engaged in our coast defenses and the manning and use of the coast guns of the fortifications and the drill and tactics of the field artillery. The latter belong to the mobile army just exactly as the infantry and cavalry do, and they are now placed where they belong. We are attempting to enlarge posts so that we shall have brigade posts, with the tactical unit of a brigade, for maneuvers under general officers and with the brigade discipline and drill which prepare the men and officers for fieldwork in large maneuvers. All this progress is slow, but it is being made.

One of the greatest improvements which has been made in our Army is in the graduate education of its officers. West Point is as thorough a school for general military education as there is in the world, and this has been long established. The great improvement, however, in the education of our officers in the last decade has been the institution of graduate schools in the different branches of the service. Officers are now studying in garrison schools, and then are offered the opportunity, if they show themselves fit, of taking a course in the Artillery School at Fortress Monroe, in the Engineers' School at Washington, in the Infantry and Cavalry School at Fort Leavenworth, or in the Cavalry School of Equation at Fort Riley, according to their respective branches. Then if they succeed by competition in establishing their right to do so, they are enabled to take a course at the Staff College at Leavenworth. Selected from all the Army are the most likely young officers for the War College at Washington, where they are engaged in working out problems of grand strategy.

The other great improvement in the Army has been the establishment of a General Staff, consisting of men selected by a board of general officers without consultation with the President or Secretary of War for their fitness, who act as advisors to the Chief of Staff and to the Secretary of War, and whose business it is to recommend policies and to make plans for defense and for possible campaigns. The Chief of Staff and the General Staff coordinate all the bureaus of the Army and preserve a consistent policy without respect to changing Secretaries and the changing personnel of the general officers. The system of education and of the General Staff have been in operation now for several years and fully justify the hopes of those who brought about these two reforms.

There is a dearth of officers. We have only about 3,600 officers, and so many are detailed on important duties connected with military schools, with militia, with teaching at West Point, with the graduate schools in the Army, and with the recruiting service and on the General Staff, that a bill has passed the Senate authorizing the increase of officers by something over 600. This will enable us to detail officers to take charge of the militia in every State and to remain permanently on duty with the National Guard, and thus make it possible to make the discipline of the National Guard like that of the Regular Army.

This brings me to the great improvement which has been made by recent legislation in respect to the militia. By the "Dick bill," which was introduced in Congress by the then Representative and now Senator DICK, and which passed in 1902, the National Guard became recognized as the organized militia of the State, subject to call by the General Government and entitled to arms, munition, clothing, supplies, and transportation, in case it organized and adopted the discipline of the Regular Army.

Another bill is now pending which is likely to pass, increasing the benefits to be derived by the National Guard, enlarging the time of service and the character of service, under direction of the Federal authorities, and authorizing a continuance of the joint maneuvers between the Regulars and the militia, who have already proven to be successful and have developed an intense enthusiasm and interest on the part of the State soldiers. In the course of five or six years we may count on having a well-disciplined force of organied militia, subject to call by the President, amounting to 120,000, so that we might be sure of putting in the field on short notice an army of 200,000 men. This would not be enough, and we should have to resort to a volunteer law which has been introduced in Congress, and which I hope will pass, preparing for the organization of volunteers under regular officers and officers of the National Guard, which shall constitute a third or volunteer force of the United States Army.

A bill is now pending in Congress also authorizing the employment, upon a small stipend for a drill every two years, of men who have served in the Regular Army and been discharged, as a reserve corps out of which the Regular Army could be enlarged at once in case war were declared or threatened. This would enable us to increase the Regular Army to 150,000 men without great difficulty and would secure us 250,000 well-equipped, well-drilled soldiers of the Republic. This plan for a small army, capable of rapid expansion, is perfected but not carried out fully into legislation. I am glad to say, however, that Congress manifests such an interest in the development of the Army and a willingness from time to time to improve the various branches that during the next decade I feel confident that we shall soon have a Regular Army and a reserve citizen soldiery sufficient to put into the field 250,000 men capable of carrying on war with courage and efficiency. Of course in the support of such an army the Republic is subjected to very heavy expense, because the whole Army, both regular, malitia, and volunteers, are volunteers and must receive compensation sufficient to enable them to live and support somebody beside themselves. We do not raise the armies by conscription except in the very last resort. As a consequence, our armies are vastly much more expensive than the European armies even in time of peace. Our Regular Army to-day of 60,000 men costs us about $72,000,000 a year. France maintains an army of 546,000 men and it costs her $133,000,000 a year. Germany maintains an army of 645,000 men, and it costs her $144,000,000 a year. In other words, France has an army nine times the size of ours, which it costs her less than twice the sum to maintain, while Germany has an army ten times as large as ours which it costs her just about double our sum to maintain. In addition to this we are paying out pensions for our civil war and Spanish war veterans of $150,000,000. In view of this it is entirely natural for the Representatives of the people in Congress to hesitate to increase a military establishment so expensive as compared with other nations. The lesson from the pension fund, however, instead of being, as it is thought to be, a restraint upon expenditure to secure an efficient army, ought, if historically and critically considered, to be a warning against the lack of preparation, for the extent of that pension roll is itself the greatest exponent of the fatuity of a policy of insufficient national defense.

A shortsighted parsimony with respect to an efficient army which might suppress a rebellion or end a foreign war in a short time leads to the raising of enormous fresh levies of unskilled troops and the expenditure of great treasure which might have been avoided. After the emergency arises, and when it is too late for economical preparation, then the legislature opens the Treasury by appropriations and provisions of the greatest liberality to meet the necessities which only time and thorough preparation could properly and economically meet.

I do not think that I can close this address by any words more appropriate than those of Washington while he was President, when he said:

"The United States ought not to indulge in a persuasion that, contrary to the order of human events, they will forever keep at a distance those painful appeals to arms with which the history of every nation abounds.

"There is a rank due to the United States among nations which will be withheld, if not absolutely lost, by the reputation of weakness.

"If we desire to avoid insult, we must be able to repel it.

"If we desire to secure peace, one of the most powerful instruments of our rising prosperity, it must be known that we are at all times ready for war."

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the item between lines 20 and 23, on page 72, has been reserved. I shall ask the Senate to remain in session only a few minutes longer, to get through the routine part. Then I shall ask for an adjournment. The clerk may continue the reading.

Mr. MONEY. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine to have printed in the RECORD the list that he has of the navies of the world. He has it all ready, I believe, for publication, and I ask him if he will not have it printed in the RECORD, so that the people of the United States may see what we have.

Mr. HALE. I shall be very glad to have that done.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. HALE. Now, having reached the item for the increase of the Navy, I yield to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], who desires to move an executive session.

Mr. CULLOM obtained the floor.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator from Illinois yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CULLOM. I yield.

FOREST SERVICE EMPLOYEES.

Mr. HEYBURN. I submit a resolution and ask for its present consideration. It merely calls for information.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho submits a resolution, for which he asks present consideration. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, by the Senate, That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate a statement containing the name and official designation of any officer or employee of the Forest Service who has attended any meeting or convention during the year 1907; whether such convention was official or unofficial; the place from which such employee started to attend such convention; the place of his employment, and the amount of expense incurred by reason of such attendance upon such meeting or convention which has been paid by the Government.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. It merely calls for information.

Mr. NELSON. Let it go over.

Mr. LODGE. Let the resolution go over, Mr. President. I should like to have time to look at it.

Mr. HEYBURN. The agricultural appropriation bill can not be disposed of until that information is with the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. It is a pretty long resolution. I should like to look at it before it is passed. I have heard it read only once.

Mr. KEAN. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] also asked to have it go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, April 23, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 1424) to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15219) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909.

REMOVAL OF RESTRICTION FROM PART OF LAND OF ALLOTTEES OF FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

Mr. MCGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill H. R. 15641, for the removal of restrictions from part of the lands of allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes, and for other purposes, with amendments.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15641) for the removal of restrictions from part of the lands of allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after sixty days from the date of this act the status of the lands allotted heretofore or hereafter to allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes shall, as regards restrictions on alienation or incumbrance, be as follows: All lands, including homesteads, of said allottees enrolled as intermarried whites shall be free from all restrictions. All lands, including homesteads, of said allottees enrolled as freedmen shall be free from all restrictions. All lands, including homesteads, of said allottees enrolled as of less than half Indian blood shall be free from all restrictions. All lands, except homesteads, of said allottees enrolled as mixed-blood Indians having half or more than half Indian blood shall be free from all restrictions. All homesteads of said allottees enrolled as mixed-blood Indians having half or more than half Indian blood and all allotted lands of enrolled living full bloods shall not be subject to alienation, contract to sell, power of attorney, or any other incumbrance prior to April 26, 1931, except that the Secretary of the Interior may remove such restrictions, wholly or in part, under such rules and regulations concerning terms of sale and disposal of the proceeds for the benefit of the respective Indians as he may prescribe. The Secretary of the Interior shall not be prohibited by this act from continuing to remove restrictions as heretofore, and nothing herein shall be construed to impose restrictions removed from land by or under any law prior to the passage of this act.

SEC. 2. That all land allotted to adult allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes and subject to restriction may be leased by the allottees, or in the case of minors as provided in section 6 hereof, for periods not exceeding five years without the privilege of renewal, except that oil, gas, or other mineral leases of adults for any period of time, and other leases of adults if made for more than five years, of any such restricted lands, may be made with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior and not otherwise.

SEC. 3. That the rolls of citizenship and of freedmen of the Five Civilized Tribes approved by the Secretary of the Interior shall be conclusive evidence as to the age and the quantum of Indian blood of any enrolled citizen or freedman of said tribes to determine questions arising under this act.

SEC. 3a. That all oil, gas, and other mineral leases entered into by any of said allottees prior to the removal of restrictions requiring the approval of the Secretary of the Interior shall not be rendered invalid by this act, but the same shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior as if this act had not been passed: Provided, That the owner or owners of any allotted land from which restrictions are removed by this act, or have been removed by previous acts of Congress, or by the Secretary of the Interior, or may hereafter be removed under and by authority of any act of Congress, shall have the power to cancel and annul any oil, gas, or mineral lease on said land whenever the owner or owners of said land and the owner or owners of the lease thereon agree in writing to terminate said lease and file with the Secretary of the Interior, or his designated agent, a true copy of the agreement in writing canceling said lease, which said agreement shall be executed and acknowledged by the parties thereto in the manner required by the laws of Oklahoma for the execution and acknowledgment of deeds, and the same shall be recorded in the county where the land is situate.

SEC. 4. That all land from which restrictions shall have been removed shall be subject to taxation and all other civil burdens as though it were the property of other persons than allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes: And provided further, That allotted lands shall not be subjected or held liable to any form of personal claim or demand against the allottees arising or existing prior to the removal of restrictions, other than contracts heretofore expressly permitted by law.

SEC. 5. That any attempted alienation or incumbrance by deed, mortgage, contract to sell, power of attorney, or other instrument or method of incumbering real estate, made before or after the approval of this act, which affects the title of the land allotted to allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes prior to removal of restrictions therefrom, and also any lease of such restricted land made in violation of law before or after the approval of this act shall be absolutely null and void.

SEC. 6. That the persons and property of minor allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes shall, except as otherwise specifically provided by law, be subject to the jurisdiction of the probate courts of the State of Oklahoma. The Secretary of the Interior is hereby empowered, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him, to appoint such local representatives for the eastern judicial district of the State of Oklahoma as he may deem necessary to inquire into and investigate the conduct of guardians and curators having in charge the estates of such minors, and whenever such representative or representatives of the Secretary of the Interior shall be of opinion that the estate of any minor is not being properly cared for by the guardian and curator, or that the same is in any manner being dissipated or wasted or being permitted to deteriorate in value by reason of the negligence or carelessness or incompetency of the guardians and curator, said representative or representatives of the Secretary of the Interior shall have power and it shall be their duty to report said matter in full to the proper probate court and take the necessary steps to have such matter fully investigated, and go to the further extent of prosecuting any necessary remedy, either civil or criminal, or both, to preserve the property and protect the interests of said minor allottees; and it shall be the further duty of such representative or representatives to make full and complete reports to the Secretary of the Interior. All such reports, either to the Secretary of the Interior or to the proper probate court, shall become public records and subject to the inspection and examination of the public, and the necessary court fees shall be allowed against the estates of said minors. The probate courts may, in their discretion, appoint any such representative of the Secretary of the Interior as guardian and curator for such minors, without fee or charge.

And said representatives of the Secretary of the Interior are further authorized, and it is made their duty, to counsel and advise all allottees, adult or minor, having restricted lands of all of their legal rights with reference to their restricted lands, without charge, and to advise them in the preparation of all leases authorized by law to be made, and at the request of any allottee having restricted land he shall, without charge, except the necessary court and recording fees and expenses, if any, in the name of the allottee, take such steps as may be necessary, including the bringing of any suit or suits and the prosecution and appeal thereof, to cancel and annul any deed, conveyance, mortgage, lease, contract to sell, power of attorney, or any other encumbrance of any kind or character, made or attempted to be made or executed in violation of this act or any other act of Congress, and to take all steps necessary to assist said allottees in acquiring and retaining possession of their restricted lands.

Supplemented to the funds appropriated and available for expenses connected with the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes, there is hereby appropriated for the salaries and expenses arising under this section, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $90,000, to be available immediately and until July 1, 1909, for expenditure under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That no restricted lands of living minors shall be sold or encumbered, except leases authorized by law, by order of the court or otherwise.

And there is hereby further appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available and available until expended as the Attorney-General may direct, the sum of $50,000, to be used in the payment of expenses incident to any suits brought at the request of the Secretary of the Interior in the eastern judicial district of Oklahoma.

SEC. 7. That no contest shall be instituted after sixty days from the date of the selection of any allotment hereafter made, nor after ninety days from the approval of this act in case of selections made prior thereto by or for any allottee of the Five Civilized Tribes, and, as early thereafter as practicable, deed or patent shall issue therefor.

SEC. 8. That section 23 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," approved April 26, 1906, is hereby amended by substituting for the words "a United States commissioner," at the end of said section, the words "a judge of a county court of the State of Oklahoma."

SEC. 9. That the death of any allottee of the Five Civilized Tribes shall operate to remove all restrictions from the alienation of said allottee's land: Provided, That no conveyance of any interest of any full-blood Indian heir in such land shall be valid unless approved by the court having jurisdiction of the settlement of said estate.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, a second is ordered.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It may be, Mr. Speaker, that somebody is opposed to this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Oklahoma opposed to the bill?

Mr. CARTER. I am not.

The SPEAKER. Is there any gentleman opposed to this bill that desires to demand a second?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is impossible to tell, Mr. Speaker, at this time whether the bill is satisfactory to everybody or not. If the gentleman from Oklahoma is disposed to yield time to both sides, I do not care to object.

Mr. CARTER. I will yield time to both sides.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, a second is ordered, and the gentleman from Oklahoma is entitled to twenty minutes and his colleague [Mr. CARTER] is entitled to twenty minutes.

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, this bill relates to what is known in Oklahoma as the "Five Civilized Tribes"—the Choctaws, Chickasaws, Cherokees, Creeks, and Seminole Indians. These five tribes occupy nearly the entire portion of that part of the State of Oklahoma which was originally the Indian Territory—in other words, nearly one-half of the State of Oklahoma. Under existing law they can not alienate their lands. They have their homesteads. Nearly all of them, in addition to their homesteads, have what is known there as "surplus land." Under the present law they can not alienate; under the law as it is these lands can not be taxed. Since Oklahoma has become a State this portion of the State has been organized into counties and county governments, and in a great portion of that territory there has been organized school districts.

But we now encounter this difficulty: While we have county organizations, there is no real estate outside of the cities upon which a levy can be made for the purposes of taxation, and consequently we are unable to support local government and unable to support common schools.

If this bill passes it will release about three-fifths of that part of Oklahoma and make it taxable. The bill does not affect the full-blood Indian in that country, except that it provides that a showing may be made to the Secretary of the Interior by any Indian of full blood, and if that showing, in the judgment of the Secretary, is sufficient he can secure a patent in fee for his land, but he must show that he has the capability; he must show that he is competent to transact his own business.

Upon what is known in that State as the "intermarried whites" the bill removes restrictions entirely. These people were allotted with the Indians, and hold their allotment and surplus. It also removes the restriction which is now upon the land of the freedman of that country, who also under the law was allotted with the Indians. It removes the restrictions entirely upon the Indian of mixed blood where he is less than one-half Indian blood. It removes restrictions upon all but the homestead—that is, the surplus of the Indian of full blood or more than half of Indian blood.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman from Oklahoma explain what he means by surplus land?

Mr. McGUIRE. Under the laws passed based upon treaty the Indian took so much land for a homestead, and then the remainder was divided among the various members of the tribe, and the remaining portion is called "surplus land."

Mr. SCOTT. What proportion does it bear to all the land held by the Indians?

Mr. McGUIRE. That I am not prepared to say.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a very small proportion—under 5 per cent.

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like to ask the gentleman if there is anything in this bill granting any right of alienation of any homestead either to a freedman, mixed blood, or full blood?

Mr. McGUIRE. The bill provides for alienation on homesteads of intermarried whites, of the freedman, and of the person less than one-half of Indian blood.

Mr. MURDOCK. Of the homestead?

Mr. McGUIRE. Of the homestead.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma a question with reference to restrictions of homesteads in Oklahoma, whether or not it is necessary for the wife to join with the husband in making the deed.

Mr. McGUIRE. In Oklahoma it is, under the Oklahoma statute.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then the Indian wife here would have to join her husband in making a deed to the homestead.

Mr. McGUIRE. She would.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And that would have to be severally acknowledged and recorded in accordance with the constitution and laws of Oklahoma.

Mr. McGUIRE. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McGUIRE. I will.

Mr. MANN. The bill, as the gentleman offers it, I notice, has a number of amendments which have never been printed. Will the gentleman say whether the bill as now presented has the unqualified approval of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs?

Mr. McGUIRE. The bill has been amended in a minor way since it was approved by the Secretary of the Interior, but in no material point.

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not know what the object is in bringing in immaterial amendments on a motion to suspend the rules. I should like to know whether they have the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Oklahoma will yield to me for a moment——

Mr. McGUIRE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendments that are now presented to the bill are largely phraseological, to make more clear and distinct the real intent of the bill. I have discussed the bill with the Secretary of the Interior, not with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and I know what his attitude toward it is, and I know that the main principle as laid down in this bill meets with the unqualified approval of the Secretary of the Interior. The amendments do not change the question of who shall be given the right to alienate, nor do the amendments change any other principle of the bill. One amendment here, for instance, is transposed from section 1 to section 4 with an amendment, because it is more appropriately in section 4 as a part of the subject there treated.

Mr. MANN. Does this bill, then, meet the approval of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs?

Mr. McGUIRE. It does.

Mr. SHERMAN. About the Commissioner of Indian Affairs I will have to leave the gentleman from Oklahoma to state, because I have not discussed this with him, either before the bill was approved or since; but I have discussed it with the Secretary of the Interior, and I know the bill as now presented in principle meets his approval, and the amendments that are now suggested do not change in any particular the object sought to be attained by the bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman from New York permit a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will, if the gentleman from Oklahoma will yield further.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There is an amendment here that must be a mistake, on page 2, lines 21, 22, and 23.

Provided, That these lands shall not be subjected or held liable to any form of personal claim or demand against the allottees arising or existing prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is transferred to section 4, where it more appropriately belongs.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I thought there must be some mistake about that.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendment is transferred to section 4.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I see another part of the bill provides that leases of oil and coal lands heretofore existing have to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and that these shall be binding on the Indians and lessees when so approved, and consequently that provision would leave a lease inoperative if left standing as it is if the Secretary should not approve the lease. Would that be right?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; this is the purpose of that: There are leases already made which are in process of being approved—that is, they have not yet reached the Secretary of the Interior for his final action thereon, and so this provision is to make it impossible to invalidate those until they have reached the Secretary. Then, if approved, they are validated, and if he disapproves they are invalidated.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I don't think these leases should be invalidated, because many men have expended money on them on faith of their being approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is precisely what the provision does—it makes it impossible to invalidate them.

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, if I have some time I think I can answer the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma reserves the balance of his time, ten minutes.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I can explain the proposition about which the gentleman from Texas was asking, and I will also explain to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] this amendment, which has been transposed from the bottom of section 1 to the bottom of section 4. In that there has been a slight change.

The amendment originally read:

Provided, That these lands shall not be subjected or held liable to any form of personal claim or demand against the allottees arising or existing prior to the passage of this act.

This amendment, as changed and placed at the end of section 4, reads as follows:

Provided further, That allotted lands shall not be subject or held liable to any form of personal claim or demand against the allottees arising or existing prior to the removal of restrictions other than contracts heretofore expressly permitted by law.

The words "other than contracts heretofore expressly permitted by law" were not in the original bill at all. And that explains it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think that is satisfactory, because if left standing here, without some subsequent part of the bill modifying it, it would invalidate their rights.

Mr. CARTER. This slight change was made for that specific purpose. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS] wrote that amendment at my suggestion, and in order that legal contracts already in existence might not be impaired the latter clause was added.

Mr. SAUNDERS. That addendum is not found in the original amendment.

Mr. ADAIR. May I ask the gentleman a question? Is this bill unanimously reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs?

Mr. CARTER. Yes; it is.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman from Oklahoma state whether this has been the policy of the Government as to other Indian lands, or will the gentleman yield to the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs to answer the question.

Mr. CARTER. I yield to the chairman of the committee to answer that.

Mr. SHERMAN. It has always been our policy to limit the right to alienate for a specific length of time all over the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. But you are removing the limitation of alienation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, we are removing in part the power of alienation, but a very large portion of the entire State is made up of this land, so that, unless you release the limitation upon alienation, you have no land which you can tax for carrying on county and municipal divisions.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is there any instance where the Government has heretofore raised the barrier of alienation under like conditions?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, certainly, there is a general provision under which the Secretary of the Interior can release the limitation on alienation of the land of any Indian who on investigation he determines is competent to take care of himself, and under that provision there have been two or three million acres of this very land already released from alienation.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under this bill you are permitting alienation beyond the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, without his approval, and vesting it entirely in these designated classes of Indians.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is what we are doing, but with the approval of the Secretary. We are in this manner releasing 8,000,000 out of 19,000,000 of acres of land, that is all; we are not releasing all of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. When the gentleman suggests with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior does he mean to convey the impression that no transfer of any of this allotted land will be permitted except upon approval of the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no; I mean to say that the Secretary of the Interior approved this bill; in fact, this bill was drawn in the Interior Department.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understood the bill when it was read, it takes away all discretion from the Secretary and vests all power of alienation in these designated Indians.

Mr. SHERMAN. In certain classes and to certain lands.

Mr. STAFFORD. Those having less than half blood.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And to homestead also.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman in regard to this proviso which is on page 2 and which I understand is an amendment to come in paragraph 4, which provides as follows:

Provided, That these lands shall not be subjected or held liable to any form of personal claim or demand against the allottees arising or existing prior to the passage of this act.

Now, if the gentleman will permit, is the purpose of this proviso to relieve the Indians who get ownership of their land free from restrictions from all liability to previous debts?

Mr. CARTER. That is to relieve the land——

Mr. SHERLEY. Is it the purpose to relieve a man from the payment of his debts when he gets control of his property?

Mr. CARTER. I can explain that in just a minute.

In Oklahoma the lands at the present time are restricted. They are not subject to any of these personal claims or any judgments, and for that reason a great many judgments have been taken against Indians down there by default. The Indians knew a judgment could not be enforced as against their lands, and so they did not appear in court in many instances. A great many of them are judgments which are not just, but they cloud the title. That is the very thing we are trying to clear up now, and we want to give the Indians a new start. We want to turn this class loose with these lands and let them take a new start without any cloud on the title of their lands whatever.

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not think there is anything in the fact of the cloud on the title, because any cloud by reason of a judgment or lien can be gotten rid of at any time. There may be something in the proposition of the gentleman that inasmuch as these Indians have had judgments go by default against them, which are not judgments in equity, therefore they should not be enforced against the land.

Mr. CARTER. It has always been the policy of the Department, the Indian Office, and the Federal Government not to allow any claim enforced against an Indian's land on which there were restrictions.

Mr. SHERLEY. The proposition that strikes me as rather startling is that a judgment that is supposed to represent a debt should not be paid by the man who is considered as sufficiently capable to be given full possession of his land.

Mr. CARTER. This simply releases him from that obligation so far as his land is concerned, and no further.

Mr. SHERLEY. As I understand it, it simply prevents the collecting of the debt.

Mr. ADAIR. Does the judgment still stand against him, and could it not be collected against his personal property?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, I think that I can answer the questions that have been asked in relation to this amendment so as to satisfy the gentlemen who have propounded them.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

Mr. SAUNDERS. The Indians to whom this amendment relates could not be subjected before the passage of this bill to any form of personal liability. There was no way under the law by which they could be held liable.

Mr. SHERLEY. Why?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Simply because the statutes provided it could not be done.

Mr. SHERLEY. Was not the reason based on the supposition that the Indian was not able to take care of himself?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now that he is able to take care of the land to the extent that he is given absolute control of it, why should he not be answerable for his debts?

Mr. CARTER. Because the debts were contracted before the Indian was considered capable.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The answer to that, Mr. Speaker, is, that as to subsequent accruing liabilities, after these restrictions are removed, the Indian will be held liable. This amendment simply removes any question of liability as to contracts undertaken to be entered into at a time when he was not capable to make a contract.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Where does that appear?

Mr. SAUNDERS. That appears in the amendment.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Is it not general?

Mr. SAUNDERS. The fact that the Indian could not enter into these contracts is general, but the suggestion was made that possibly when we removed these restrictions it might be hereafter considered that, in some way, this removal validated those claims which were not valid prior to the removal of the restrictions.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Now, if the Indian contracted debts and incurred obligations at a time when he had sufficient understanding and knew just what it meant to contract a debt, or just what it meant to incur an obligation, why should he be released now when it is conceded or, rather, when it is claimed by those in charge of the bill that he has sufficinet intelligence to deal with his lands?

Mr. SAUNDERS. When was that time? You observe that those contracts relate to a period when, by the general statutes, the Indian was presumed to be incapable of contracting.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit——

Mr. SAUNDERS. Certainly.

Mr. SHERLEY. The contract would not be enforcible in the form of a judgment unless both parties to it were capable of making a contract.

Mr. SAUNDERS. You observe from the statement made by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] that these Indians are seeking relief as to contracts which were made at a time when they had a right to consider that they could not be enforced.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. That does not appear in the bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS. It does not make any difference whether it appears in the bill or not. The amendment relates to conditions that existed under other statutes.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman does not catch the point I desire to make.

Mr. SAUNDERS. I think I do.

Mr. SHERLEY. Which is that if the Indian is capable of making a valid contract, he ought to live up to it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. But this was before he was capable of making a valid contract.

Mr. SHERLEY. If he was not able to make a valid contract, there is no valid contract that you need to bother about.

Mr. SHERMAN. The purpose of this is to show that Congress so intended. I do not think that they could enforce them, but the point of the committee was that it was the intent that no illegal contract should be a lien on any of these lands, it being suggested that if we remove that restriction it might have a retroactive effect and validate these invalid contracts.

Mr. SHERLEY. It can not do it. It can not have the effect of validating an invalid contract.

Mr. SHERMAN. In case there is a contract which the Indian was capable of making, this law will not have that effect. It expressly leaves valid every contract which under the general laws the Indian was capable of making.

Mr. CARTER. I will state to the gentleman from Kentucky that the Indian is considered capable in everything except the management of his tribal estate—that is, his land.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Why should he not pay his debts?

Mr. SAUNDERS. These were debts that he could not incur.

Mr. MURDOCK. Let us have order.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has six minutes remaining.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. CARTER. I have only six minutes; I can not yield.

Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for straightening out land conditions in the State of Oklahoma in a way that will be equitable to all classes concerned. We have on the tribal rolls a number of whites and freedmen and a considerable number of Indians, something more than 100,000 in all, I believe.

Several MEMBERS. Go down in front, CARTER. Come down in front, Indian; we can not hear you.

Mr. CARTER. A very large proportion of these people are fully competent to take care of themselves and are able to stand up and hold their own without the strong arm of the Federal Government to protect them.

There are in round numbers 20,000,000 acres of land in our State owned by this class of people. As I have stated before on the floor of this House, this land is nontaxable and inalienable.

This bill proposes a fair adjustment of these conditions. It provides that some of these lands may be taxed; it provides that those who are competent may be allowed to handle their own property according to the dictates of their own judgment, and without Federal supervision. It provides for the removal of restrictions upon the intermarried citizen, the white man, who is not an Indian at all. It provides for the removal of restrictions on the freedmen, the former slave of the tribesmen, who is not an Indian at all. It provides for the removal of restrictions upon the lands of the Indian having less than half Indian blood, who is not an Indian at all except for revenue purposes.

It provides for the removal of restrictions on the surplus allotment of the mixed-blood Indian of half or more than half Indian blood, and there it stops, leaving the entire allotment of the full-blood Indian and the homestead of the mixed-blood Indian of half or more than half Indian blood in statu quo—that is to say, these lands are left inalienable and nontaxable, with the exception that the Secretary may remove such restrictions upon a showing of competency by the Indian or whenever, in his opinion, it will conserve the Indian's best interest to have a part of such lands sold.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is a foolish sentimentality that prompts any man familiar with the facts to say that the class above referred to are incompetent. That there may be some cases of incompetency, no one will attempt to deny. There always exists these exceptions. In these strenuous times of commercialism and development no man or set of men are thoroughly competent to deal with every proposition that confronts them. As an evidence of this fact I submit that I and other Members of this House often vote for or against a measure which we do not thoroughly understand, but this is the exception and not the rule.

Those Indians whose restrictions are removed by this bill are, as a rule, just such men as I. I see that some of the gentlemen seem to be skeptical about this statement, but the proof of the pudding is in the chewing the string, and if you will come out into Oklahoma you will find that a great many of these Indians are worth ten times as much of this world's goods as I, and if you will attempt to make a few deals with them you will find when you are through that you are not worth as much as you were before. [Laughter.] I think this ought to be evidence sufficient of their business capacity as compared to mine. This bill does not propose to remove restrictions from those who are incompetent as a class, but leaves the restrictions upon their land until, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, it is to their best interest to have such lands sold.

No man on the floor of this House is more zealous in his desire to protect the incompetent Indians than I. No one of you can feel more keenly his responsibility to this person than I. No one would deplore more than I seeing the incompetent Indian left absolutely helpless.

No one would regret more than I seeing them driven into a state of vagrancy, and when legislation in this Chamber approaches the point of permitting the plunder of incompetent Indians, you will always hear my feeble voice raised in protest. What becomes of these people if they are left homeless? Why, the State of Oklahoma, and not the Federal Government, will have to care for them if they become paupers. Therefore, I do not think the people of the State of Oklahoma want the last home of the incompetent Indian turned loose, so that he may be cheated out of his just rights.

Mr. SULZER. Are the Indians in favor of this bill?

Mr. CARTER. Yes, sir; they are.

Mr. SULZER. If they are, then I am in favor of the bill.

Mr. CARTER. Only a few days ago the President of the United States went a great deal further in his recommendation than this bill provides. He told the Secretary of the Interior that he wanted the restrictions removed from every acre of land in Oklahoma except the 40-acre homestead of the full-blood Indian. Now, some of you gentlemen, imbued with a misguided sentimentality in favor of the Indian, may think this recommendation of the President a great mistake. You doubtless think it would be little short of a national crime to go to the limit recommended by the President. I do not propose at this time to have anything to say in that connection. I am not here to argue that point, but to defend the provisions of this bill, which does not, in any manner, subject the Indian to injustice.

The removal of restrictions embraced in this bill will not prove a detriment but an advantage to all of the Indians whom it affects. They are thoroughly competent, and it will place them on their own responsibility. It will give them an opportunity to handle their property to the best advantage, without any interference from the Federal Government or anyone else, which is always resented by an intelligent person. It will place all of the burdens of American citizenship upon them, and why not, since they receive all the benefits? Why place these limitations upon competent citizens of the United States? Listen to me. You place these Indians on their feet; place them on their own responsibility, give them an equal show with their white brother, grant to them full-fledged American citizenship in all that the term implies, and mark my words, they will measure up to the full standard of your American citizenship. [Loud applause.]

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, there are in the Five Civilized Tribes about 106,000 Indians. They have about 19,000,000 acres of land. By an act of Congress passed in 1907 the power to alienate over 3,000,000 acres has been given to these Indians. Under this bill the restrictions will be taken from 8,000,000 acres more, so that out of 19,500,000 acres of the Indians' land there will be 11,000,000 acres subject to alienation. Whoever is familiar with the conditions in the new State of Oklahoma realizes that some action is necessary to be taken by Congress in order that there may be land subject to taxation in that portion of the new State included within the Indian Territory.

It should be understood, Mr. Speaker, however, since this step is to be taken, which will be followed eventually by the removal of the restrictions from all of the Indians' lands in the State of Oklahoma, that the people of the State of Oklahoma should understand that after the restrictions have been removed from the Indians' land, unless they protect the Indians in their rights, Oklahoma will hereafter be compelled to support the Indians and not expect the people of the United States to do so.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman have the slightest doubt that if that condition of affairs should come about, Congress would be asked to contribute to the support of these Indians and that it would be done?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I shall agree to half of the suggestion of my friend. I have no doubt that Congress will be asked, but the answer that I would send back would be this:

> You have despoiled 100,000 Indians of 19,000,000 acres of land; you have taken their rich mineral deposits; you have squandered their vast funds; you have taken their property, and, having done so, you must take the care and responsibility of these Indians and support them without help from the rest of the United States.

To my friend from Illinois I wish to say that if Divine Providence should permit this House to be Democratic, a Democratic House, at least, would see that the people of Oklahoma lived up to their implied promise that they now make to support these Indians after they have taken their lands.

Mr. MANN. After all, would not Oklahoma and the Indians have the right to say, "This was done by virtue of an act of the Congress of the United States and not by virtue of an act of the legislature of the State of Oklahoma?"

Mr. FITZGERALD. The legislature of Oklahoma has no power to do it. I believe that before this bill is passed it is proper that somebody should send out a message to the people of Oklahoma. I do not say that they are asking this legislation in bad faith. I do not pretend that they are not as much if not more interested in making good, desirable, intelligent, and successful citizens out of the Indians than anyone else in the United States; but if there be anybody there who imagines that the United States will hereafter contribute to the expenses of maintaining these Indians, they should know now that their hopes will be vain.

Mr. McGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma has ten minutes.

Mr. McGUIRE. I yield three minutes of that time to the leader of the minority [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, the theory upon which we have taken care of the Indians in the past presents a totally different question from the condition with which we are confronted in Oklahoma now. We have treated the Indians as foreigners always. We have dealt with them by treaty just as we deal with other foreigners. They are foreigners within the bounds of the United States, it is true—tribal governments within a Territorial government and within the bounds of the General Government. This is the first time that Congress has ever dissolved the tribal relations of entire tribes who have become in the meanwhile citizens of a State. I say this in reply both to what has been said by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and to what has been said by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], to show the difference between the condition here and the conditions in the past, which bred the historic policy of the United States toward the Indians, which historic policy was a moment ago called to the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Now, Mr. Speaker, the situation is this: The white people down there are paying nearly all the taxes, while the Indians are owning nearly all the lands, and while the Indians themselves are getting no full benefit from the ownership of the land; none of the higher benefit which comes with the right of final disposition. I am in favor of the passage of this bill. I find here this statement in the report:

It will be readily observed from the foregoing statement that there is little taxable property in that portion of the State of Oklahoma except personal property and real estate in the corporate limits of cities and towns. The meaning of this is that there is a government, State and local, to support with practically no real estate upon which there may be a levy for taxable purposes. The cities are required to bear the expenses of county and State government with the exception of personal property and small per cent of outside real estate mentioned in the preceding paragraph. This leaves a portion of the people of that State bearing all the burdens of taxation, and relieves another—the most wealthy of the people of the State—from any of the burdens of taxation. The result is that it is impossible to support schools except in the extremely wealthy section more than two or three months in the year. For those persons who are taxed, the per cent of taxation is enormously high—almost unbearable.

I am very glad to support the bill, and I hope the new policy for which the precedent is established in this bill will be followed hereafter more and more. These Indians in the Indian Territory and Oklahoma are not savages; they are not barbarians, nor semibarbarians. For the most part they can read and write. They can understand what their own rights are under the law. They are independent and self-dependent citizens of the State, and they ought not to be held in tutelage and wardship any longer by the Government of the United States. It is insulting to them. Wherever we provided a contrary policy it is because of the fact that the illiteracy and ignorance of the Indian made him necessarily an object of protection of the United States Government. These people are able to protect themselves. They belong to the civilized tribe. Some of them are very wealthy. A great many of them are remarkably intelligent people, and it seems to me that in their own interest, even if nobody else were concerned, we should remove from them the shackles in which they have hitherto been bound, give them the freedom of action and the sense of responsibility which the right to dispose of their own property would give them, and that is what this bill will do to the extent at least of 8,000,000 acres of land.

Mr. McGUIRE. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, in the few moments of time that I have I desire to acquaint the House with three or four statements that the House ought to know. In the first place, the delegation from Oklahoma, each and every Member in both the House and the Senate, is in favor of this bill. When we came up here from Oklahoma we believed that the entire section of the State of Oklahoma was for the removal of these restrictions. It has been debated over the State, both among the Indians and the whites universally interested, and it has been universally asked for. We recognize the superior ability of the Indian Office and the Interior Department. We began the first day we came here, and we kept up meeting after meeting and day after day and week after week with the Indian Office and with the Secretary of the Interior and their attorneys.

This bill is agreed to by the Secretary of the Interior, by the Indian Office, by the Oklahoma delegation, and has the unanimous consent of the Committee on Indian Affairs. These people have all agreed to this bill reported, and are anxious to have it pass.

Now, one moment as to what it does. In the eastern half of the State of Oklahoma there are 19,000,000 acres of land; 3,000,000 acres of land have been removed, leaving 16,000,000 acres of land now tied up. This bill removes the restriction from the freedmen, who were formerly slaves of the Indians; it removes restrictions from the intermarried white people who went into Oklahoma and married Indian citizens, and from those with less than half Indian blood, such as the gentleman from Oklahoma, Mr. CARTER, and Senator OWEN. These Indians are at the head of banking institutions, at the head of other important business institutions, good lawyers, good physicians, and are carrying on business in all the walks of life. It is ridiculous to keep people like that tied up by these restrictions.

Now, I want to say to the House that when you say the people of Oklahoma have too much land, it seems at first a violent statement or a violent conclusion, but they have on a rough gross estimate 190 acres of land apiece. That does not seem to be very large, but you take a family with a husband, a wife, and eight children, making ten in all, and 10 times 190 is 1,900 acres, and that is too much land for any one family to own, I don't care whether it is an Indian or a white citizen or what his complexion is. A tract of 1,900 acres of land is too much for any one family to own.

This bill does not take it away from them or sell them arbitrarily. It merely lets them sell on their own motion, in their own way, and for such prices as they can procure—merely gives them the right to deal in their own way with their own property; merely makes them feel men and women in Oklahoma.

Mr. McGUIRE. I yield the rest of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Before the gentleman from New York proceeds, will he tell me what per cent of these people can read and write?

Mr. CARTER. In the Chickasaws I will say that 100 per cent of them can.

Mr. DAVENPORT. In the Cherokees there is not a man or a woman over the age of 15 years who can not read and write.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Do they own this land?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McGUIRE] have given all of the statistics that relate to this matter, so that I need not repeat those, but I want to call the attention of the House to one or two important facts in connection with the matter. All of these Indians in Oklahoma are voters. They have full franchise to-day, which the Congress of the United States has given them, although substantially all of their land—sixteen out of nineteen million acres—is now untaxed. This is a proposition to release not the total of the 19,000,000 acres, but to release one-half of the 16,000,000 acres that are now inalienable. It still leaves 8,000,000 acres of the 19,000,000 comprising the lands of the Five Civilized Tribes inalienable and nontaxable. Oklahoma proper, or old Oklahoma, contains 24,000,000 acres, and the old Indian Territory 19,000,000 acres, or 42,000,000 acres all told, and even with the passage of this bill it leaves eight million and odd thousand acres, or 20 per cent, of all the land in the new State of Oklahoma nontaxable. It does seem to me in all fairness, the large percentage of these Indians being as intelligent as the ordinary citizens in the Congressional district of any gentleman upon the floor, that they ought to be given the right to alienate these lands, and as soon as they are alienated the lands ought to be taxed. It is a heavy burden to put upon the citizens of any State, of any community, of any county, the care of meeting all expenses of the municipality or State by levying a tax therefor upon 80 per cent of the lands. This bill has been well thought out. Originally it was framed by the law officers of the Department, with the active cooperation of the Secretary himself, an able and a careful lawyer and a thoughtful man. It then came to the committee of the House, who gave full hearings to every single interest desiring it. We put no limit whatever upon the time for hearings, so that every interest has been fully heard, and at the end of those full hearings, weeks being devoted to the consideration of the matter, the Indian Committee brings in this unanimous report. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the bill ought to pass without a dissenting vote in the House.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will if I have the time.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to state that I also favor the passage of this bill and the removal of the restrictions, and in answer to what the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has said, I do not think it possible that these Indians will ever come back on the Government, for the reason that they will become voters, and after becoming voters they become citizens of the country; and hence, being citizens of Oklahoma, the United States Government never can have anything further to do with them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill as amended.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I call for the yeas and nays, in order to expedite public business.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 250, answered "present" 11, not voting 126, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

TRADE IN THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill S. 5262.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to suspend the rules and pass the following Senate bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 5262) to repeal an act approved April 30, 1906, entitled "An act to regulate shipping in trade between ports of the United States and ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago, between ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago, and for other purposes," and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That until Congress shall have authorized the registry as vessels of the United States of vessels owned in the Philippine Islands the government of the Philippine Islands is hereby authorized to adopt, from time to time, and enforce regulations governing the transportation of merchandise and passengers between ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago.

SEC. 2. That on and after the passage of this act the same tonnage taxes shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all foreign vessels coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands which are required by law to be levied, collected, and paid upon vessels coming into the United States from foreign countries.

SEC. 3. That the provisions of law restricting to vessels of the United States the transportation of passengers and merchandise directly or indirectly from one port of the United States to another port of the United States shall not be applicable to foreign vessels engaging in trade between the Philippine Islands and the United States.

SEC. 4. That the Philippine Commission shall be authorized and empowered to issue licenses to engage in lighterage or other exclusively harbor business to vessels or other craft actually engaged in such business at the date of the passage of this act and to vessels or other craft built in the Philippine Islands or in the United States and owned by citizens of the United States or by inhabitants of the Philippine Islands.

SEC. 5. That such of the navigation laws of the United States as are in force in the Philippine Islands in regard to vessels arriving in the Philippine Islands from the mainland territory and other insular possessions of the United States shall continue to be administered by the proper officials of the government of the Philippine Islands.

SEC. 6. That the act entitled "An act to regulate shipping in trade between ports of the United States and ports or places in the Philippine Islands, between ports or places in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," approved April 30, 1906, and all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, a second is ordered. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to twenty minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, this bill will, I think, have no opposition in the House when its provisions are understood. The first section does not change existing law. Section 2 does not. Section 3 is the only section in the bill which changes existing law, and it, if enacted into law, will repeal the statute which requires that after April 1 of next year all trade between the Philippines and the mainland shall be carried in American ships. That law, which would require all trade between the Philippine Islands and the mainland, whether import or export from either country, to be carried in American ships was passed in 1906. It was to go into effect a year or more ago, but Congress saw fit to extend the time when it would go into effect to April 1, 1909. Now, if that law were to stand unrepealed, the result would be one of two things, either that there would have to be a sufficient number of American ships to carry this trade and also a very material reduction in existing freight rates, or else there will not be a sufficient number of American ships to carry the trade, and the trade will go elsewhere. Although the shipping interests of the United States have had ample notice of the time when this law must go into effect, there has been but very little effort, and that a wholly unsuccessful effort, to build enough ships to meet the requirements of this trade. For example, last year the exports from the Philippine Islands to this country aggregated more than $12,000,000, of which only about $800,000 worth of those products were carried in American bottoms—that is, less than 7 per cent—6.8 per cent. The imports into the Philippine Islands from the United States were in value about $5,000,000, and of this American bottoms carried only 16 per cent—a small fraction. So it amounts to a demonstration that unless we repeal this law there will be a marked increase in the freight rates between the Philippines and the United States, and this trade will go elsewhere. There is nothing to compel the Filipinos to trade with this country. There is nothing to compel them to pay the higher freight rates, and it is inevitable, therefore, that the United States would lose much of this trade. The total imports into the Philippines last year were about $29,000,000 from all countries, and the total exports from the Islands were about $34,000,000, showing a very healthy balance of trade in favor of the Philippines of approximately $4,000,000. The report of the Insular Committee, which I drew, contains an error—an error in copying. It says:

Of the 467 steam vessels which cleared at Philippine ports—

It should have been "which entered at Manila"— only 24 were American vessels.

Manila, both in imports and exports, does about 80 per cent of the business of the Philippine Islands. This proportion of American ships to the total number of ships holds approximately good for other ports in the archipelago.

I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, the necessity for the enactment of this bill, I think, is recognized by everyone who is at all familiar with the history of legislation on the subject and the real conditions between this country and the Philippine Archipelago.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will.

Mr. WILLIAMS. As I understand this bill, it permits foreign-built ships to be used in the trade between the Philippine Islands and the United States?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And they shall continue to be used until further legislation by Congress?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to ask the gentleman this question: I introduced a bill providing that ships, no matter where bought, might be admitted to American registration and sail under the American flag if owned by Americans and if they were used exclusively in the trade between continental United States and these colonial ports. They would have been the property of American citizens. My bill did not go quite as far as this does. This bill permits ships owned by foreigners to go into the trade no matter where bought—mine only those owned by Americans. Does not the gentleman think it would have been better that American-owned ships be permitted to enter that trade, under these peculiar conditions, bought anywhere where they might have been bought, while foreign-owned ships remain excluded?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not; because there is not trade enough now between the Philippine Archipelago and the United States to justify the establishment of a coastwise line of boats. The American boats that operate now are engaged in the foreign trade, and incidentally do coastwise trade. Most of the commerce is now conducted in foreign bottoms, and if they are prohibited, it will greatly cripple the trade.

Mr. WILLIAMS. One other question. Does the gentleman think there would have been enough bottoms if the trade took in the trade between the United States and the Philippines and also between the United States and Hawaii, and between Hawaii and the Philippines?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. By no manner of means. I do not believe it would afford any substantial relief to the people of the archipelago and the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will support your bill rather than submit to a monopoly of American-built ships.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The trade between the Philippine Islands and the United States is not large, not as large as it ought to be; but if we make the shipping coastwise it will result in the practical destruction of all the trade and the loss of many of the conveniences that they now have and enormously increase the freight rates. The law we passed several years ago making our navigation laws applicable to the Philippine Islands after April 11, 1909, would not do the American merchant marine any good whatever. I feel confident sufficient American boats would not regularly enter into that trade, and the result would be the destruction rather than the building of it up.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. What is the regulation under this bill with reference to boats trading between the different ports of the United States and the Philippine Archipelago?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The regulation is under the Philippine government. Congress has committed to the government of the archipelago the power to make such regulations as it sees fit, until we have developed a merchant marine, and until we admit boats of Philippine construction to American registration.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Then I understand that under this first section the authority to enforce regulations shall include the right to permit foreign boats to trade between the different ports in the Philippines.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I understand that to be true, and that is the law now. That is the existing law. This bill practically reenacts existing law, except in section 3. This is the section that repeals the act we passed two years ago, making the coastwise laws applicable to the Philippine trade after April 11, 1909. That is the only new provision in the bill. Mr. Speaker, it should be the policy of the Federal Government to encourage the Philippine trade rather than discourage it; and if this law is not enacted, if no action is taken, the effect will be the practical destruction of Philippine commerce with America, and the loss of the means of communication that they have now.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended saying anything in regard to this measure, but since the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] has kindly yielded me a few moments I will avail myself of the opportunity to say that I very heartily approve all its provisions. I fully concur in what has been said by him and by the gentleman from Indiana. The commerce now carried on between the Philippines and the United States is very inconsiderable, indeed, it is wellnigh insignificant. Leaving out of consideration hemp, the importation of which into the United States from the Philippines exceeds in value the total value of all other Philippine products sent here from those islands, our importations are scarcely worth mentioning. This would be true, too, of hemp if it were not that the Philippine treasury is now compelled to refund the export duties which it collects upon hemp imported directly into the United States. The tax thus refunded going into the pockets of the cordage trust. But for this considerable advantage enjoyed by the cordage trust, and paid for by the poor Filipino farmer, the total volume of our trade with the Philippines, small as it now is, would be even less. If we compel all the commerce between the Philippines and the United States to be carried in American bottoms, which will be the case after the 1st of April of next year unless the operation of our coastwise laws are further suspended, we will effectually destroy the little commerce we now have with those islands. The object of this bill is to suspend the operation of those laws, not for the period of one year or of two years as has hitherto been done, but to suspend them indefinitely.

If Congress shall, by a failure to enact some legislation, permit the coastwise laws of the United States to go into operation between this country and the Philippines, there will be created a monopoly in the carrying trade between the two which all men know will greatly enhance the cost of transportation and which I firmly believe will result in the total extinction of such trade as we now have with the Philippine Islands.

This legislation is therefore demanded in the interest of the American people as well as that of the Filipinos, for unless our shipping laws are changed the trade which we now enjoy will surely go to Spain, Germany, England, and other European countries.

For these reasons I have long favored the indefinite suspension of our coastwise shipping laws as to the Philippines, rather than their suspension for a year or two at a time.

This act simply obviates the necessity for coming to every Congress and asking for a further suspension.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman from Virginia if the enactment of this bill will, in his opinion, facilitate trade between the Philippines and the United States?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I have not the slightest doubt but that it will do so. I am entirely certain that if our coastwise shipping laws go into effect as to the Philippines a year from now, as they will do unless some such measure as this is passed, we will lose what trade we now have with those islands.

Mr. SULZER. Now, Mr. Speaker, does not the gentleman from Virginia think it would be better to pass a bill to remove all restrictions on trade between the Philippines and the United States?

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I will say to the gentleman that I certainly do, and I would welcome the opportunity to vote for the removal of all restrictions; for the tearing down of the tariff wall which we have most unjustly raised up against the poor Filipinos. Having forcibly deprived them of their old-time markets, we have no moral right to exclude them from those of the United States.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with the gentleman from Virginia, and I am glad to hear him say what he has just said.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I understand from the statement made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] a few moments ago that he has introduced a bill intended to relieve this situation, and from his statement as to what his bill contains I am surprised that it is not the bill reported out by this committee. We ought to be considering now not this bill, but the bill introduced by the gentleman from Mississippi.

The effect of the measure under consideration, in brief, is to do away with our coastwise laws, so far as they relate to traffic between the United States and the Philippine Islands; in other words, to admit to that trade the vessels of any nation until some act shall have been passed here authorizing the admission to American registry of vessels owned in the Philippine Islands. And I understand from the hearings that the Secretary of War testified that the time when vessels from the Philippine Islands ought to be admitted to American registry would come whenever we had a ship subsidy in this country, and until that time shall arrive it is necessary, according to the opinion of Secretary Taft, to let the vessels of other nations engage in this trade on equal terms with our own.

Now, the object of laws affecting our shipping at the present time is or ought to be to add more tonnage to the American merchant marine. There have been only three ways for nearly a hundred years by which vessels could be added to the American merchant marine. The American citizen must buy a vessel built in an American shipyard or build a vessel in an American shipyard. If he buys her, he must buy one that has been constructed in an American shipyard and has already paid tribute to the trusts. For nearly a hundred years a vessel could be admitted to American registry in another way. An American citizen could prowl along our coasts until he found a vessel wrecked, and if he repaired her in an American shipyard and paid enough tribute to the steel trust—in other words, if the repairs cost three-fourths of her value—she could be admitted to American registry.

Mr. GREENE. I will ask the gentleman if that law is now in existence?

Mr. RAINEY. No, sir. We repealed the repaired-wreck law in the Fifty-ninth Congress; but under the repaired-wreck law we admitted to American registry over 300 vessels. By special bills we added in the same period of time 200 more repaired wrecks to our merchant marine. In other words, one-fifteenth of the entire tonnage of our merchant marine was acquired in this way. After repealing the repaired-wreck law there were then left only two ways in which an American could become the owner of a vessel. He must capture one in war or he must build one in an American shipyard or buy one that has already been built in an American shipyard. Capturing vessels in war is not a particularly profitable occupation in this country. Therefore there is only one way now, since the repaired-wreck law has been repealed, by which you can get a vessel admitted to American registry—pay tribute to the trusts in this country and build the vessel here. An American citizen can not buy a vessel built anywhere else and sail her under the American flag. He can not build a vessel out of materials admitted free of duty and use her in the coastwise trade longer than two months in the year; and on account of this limitation advantage is never taken of the law admitting material free of duty.

Now, the bill introduced by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] provides that this need of vessels between the United States and the Philippines may be supplied in a logical way; it provides that an American citizen desirous of going into that trade can buy ships wherever he pleases and avoid paying tribute to the American steel trust. There is nothing new in that policy. In 1832, when we were unable to roll iron as cheaply as they could in England, and again, in 1842, we built railroads across this country out of railroad iron admitted free of duty. We encouraged the building of railroads in those days in that manner. We roll iron cheaper here now than they do in England and maintain a tariff that excludes the rolled iron of England from competition here. We, however, successfully compete with England abroad and sell cheaper there than at home. We protect our ship industries at the present time by refusing the admission of free raw material so that it can be of real service to the industry. We have always refused to permit Americans to buy ships anywhere else except in one instance. In 1892 we passed an act which provided that American companies owning a majority of the stock in ship——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. RAINEY. As I was saying, in 1892——

Mr. BEALE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman state for the benefit of the House what was the cost of rails in 1842?

Mr. RAINEY. Oh, I do not know. In 1842 we admitted them free of duty in order to help the railroads, because they cost less abroad than they cost here. We could not make them then as cheaply at home as they were making them in England. We admitted them free of duty in 1842, and also in 1832. We produce steel rails cheaper now than in any other country in the world, therefore we protect the industry. The policy of the Republican majority in the present Congress seems to be to do what they can to help these great corporations levy some sort of tribute on the American people. [Applause on Democratic side.]

Now, in 1892 we passed an act providing for the admission to American registry of vessels built abroad when a majority of the stock of the company owning the ships was owned by American citizens, provided the Americans owning the stock would build an equal amount of tonnage in American shipyards and therefore pay some tribute to the American steel trust.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I understood the gentleman from Illinois to say that from 1832 to 1842 there was no tariff on rails or materials that went into railroads across the country.

Mr. RAINEY. No; I did not say that. I said the act of 1832 and the act of 1842 admitted steel rails free of duty, to be used in the construction of railroads across the United States.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How were they building railroads across the United States in 1832 or 1842 when the first railroad out of Chicago wasn't built until 1852?

Mr. RAINEY. They were providing for and anticipating the construction of railroads across the country, although none were built at that time entirely across the country. The gentleman will find, if he studies the tariff history of the country, that in 1832 and in 1842 iron rails were admitted free of duty.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That I understand to be true.

Mr. RAINEY. Then if it be true, there is no dispute between us.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I wanted an interpretation of the gentleman's assertion that they were admitted free of duty to construct railroads across the continent. The first railroad out of Chicago was not built until 1852.

Mr. ADAIR. They could have built them across the country.

Mr. RAINEY. Yes; and they did do it afterwards. They did aid railroad construction, whether they actually reached the Pacific coast or not, by admitting rails free of duty.

Under the act of 1892 only two ships were admitted to American registry—the City of New York and the City of Paris—and no more. Those are the only ships in our merchant marine today not built in American shipyards, except repaired wrecks. The bill introduced by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] gives American citizens the opportunity to invest their money in ships and sail them under the American flag and avoid paying tribute to the steel trust. As the matter stands now perhaps as much American capital is invested in ships sailing under foreign flags as is invested in ships sailing under our own flag. The Standard Oil Company is operating under the German flag oil vessels built in foreign shipyards, and is carrying oil to the various ports of the world—a conspicuous example of American capital invested in foreign ships, sailing under foreign flags.

If it is a good thing to have more ships in this country, then why not, in this particular at least, give Americans an opportunity to buy a few ships or build a few ships abroad? It is admitted that in this service this policy would not interfere with our coastwise trade. The mere fact that this bill has been reported out shows that the committee is of the opinion that it will not interfere with our coastwise trade to permit foreign vessels to engage in this particular trade. If it does not hurt the coastwise trade in any way to permit foreign ships to enter this particular field, then why not give American capital the opportunity to buy ships abroad for this trade and escape the exactions of the steel trust in this country? We would then own the vessels engaged in this trade and the tonnage of our merchant marine would be considerably increased without resorting to subsidies. Foreign ships can always be built for two-thirds of the price they cost in this country, on account alone of the difference in the cost of materials.

It is proposed here to hold the trade of the Philippine Islands by this temporary makeshift, and at the same time fully protect the American Steel Company. You are not supporting the shipbuilding industry any more in this country by refusing to admit to American registry vessels built abroad. An American citizen can buy anything abroad and bring it back to this country except a ship, and there is no reason why he should not be permitted to buy ships, especially for this trade.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WOODYARD). The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield five more minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, shipbuilding in this country is not a craft any more. It is not necessary to protect it by this character of laws. Shipbuilding in this country is simply a process of manufacture. We manufacture watches, we do not make them any more. They simply feed strips of metal into a machine and it comes out parts of watches at the other end. You can not find watchmakers any more in this country. There are no shoemakers now. No man can make a shoe unless he is a very old man at the present time. We manufacture all of our shoes, and we manufacture ships. Nowadays the man who makes the blueprints builds the ship, and it does not take subsidies and coastwise laws to develop men who can make blueprints. The enlarged blueprints are laid down on a floor. Strips of basswood are laid over the blueprints and cut out, and from the basswood strips the parts of an iron ship are quickly molded up. The parts are then riveted together, and the ship is quickly launched and finished up.

It does not require subsidies to accomplish that. They are building ships now in other parts of the world—iron ships—in about half the time it takes us to build them here. It requires now in a shipyard only a few men skilled in the metal trades and a large number of laborers. Yet we are maintaining our absurd navigation laws upon the theory that we are helping to build up a shipbuilding industry in this country. The real reason why we maintain our navigation laws is this: We maintain them intact in order to enable the steel trust to charge 33⅓ per cent more for ship plates sold here in American shipyards than those same steel ship plates, manufactured by the same trust, are sold to foreign yards.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Is it not true that under the present tariff law all imported material that goes into the construction of a ship comes in free of duty; that shipbuilders pay no duty on imported material, iron or anything else?

Mr. RAINEY. I am not surprised that the gentleman makes that mistake. The same mistake was made by the President of the United States in an address he made not long ago. I deny that that is the law. The law is this: Under the law of 1894, and again under the law of 1897, material for the construction of ships to be used——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. RAINEY. Material for the construction of ships constructed for foreign ownership or to be used in the foreign trade are admitted free of duty, provided a ship constructed for American ownership out of material admitted free of duty can be used in the coastwise trade for only sixty days in the year.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I ought to have qualified my question according to the gentleman's statement. I knew, of course, that ships that are used in the coastwise trade and have an absolute monopoly of that trade secure no special advantages in construction, but it is true that ships built in American shipyards for the foreign trade do have the right to import material for construction free of duty.

Mr. RAINEY. I just stated that, and the vessel can be used in our profitable coastwise trade for only sixty days in the year, and during all the life of that vessel it is excluded from our coastwise trade for a longer period each year than that. I have a bill pending here providing for free raw material for building and equipping ships. There are 1,200 firms and individuals in the United States engaged in building ships or in equipping and furnishing material for ships. I wrote to every one of them and got 500 answers. I was able to find only one ship ever constructed in an American yard which took advantage of the law of 1897, the Dirigo, of Maine. I was able to find only one ship that ever repaired under that law, and I have letters from both those shipowners and they say they are sorry they took advantage of it. Why? Because they are excluded forever from our coastwise trade; you can not coast sixty days in the year and go foreign the rest of the time. It cost James J. Hill nearly a million dollars more to build the Minnesota and the Dakota out of American material, although those two vessels were to be used in exclusive foreign trade, than it would have cost him if he had taken advantage of this law. Why didn't he do it? Because during the entire life of those great ships—one of them is now destroyed—if he had taken advantage of this law, he could not have stopped at two American ports on the Pacific coast before crossing the ocean, and so he paid the tribute of a million dollars to the steel trust and built them out of American material. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi has one minute remaining.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, I do not know just exactly how it was calculated, but there ought to be at least two minutes remaining. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this bill because I am in favor of treating the Filipinos fairly and generously——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair begs the gentleman's pardon. The gentleman from Mississippi has three minutes remaining.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Ah, I thought it could not be less than two. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of treating the Filipinos fairly as long as they are unjustly held under the American flag. I would give them the benefit of our markets to purchase our goods in, and I would give our people the benefit of their markets to purchase their goods in. And I would give them the cheapest possible freight for the trade between them and us, and undoubtedly the cheapest possible freight could be secured by allowing full competition in the freight-carrying business between the two localities.

Ninety per cent of the ships engaged in the trade between continental United States and the Philippines are of foreign ownership. I introduced a bill, the object of which was to enable American-owned ships to be bought anywhere by Americans who chose to buy them and go into the business, and to be free of the restrictions of the coastwise navigation laws so long as they were exclusively used in the trade between the mainland of the United States and the Philippines or Hawaii, or between the Philippines and Hawaii. I wanted to try the experiment and see if we could not build up an American merchant marine in the Pacific Ocean by free American-owned ships. Now, this committee, with its large majority of Republicans, seemed to prefer rather to have foreign ships carry on the business than to have American-owned free ships carry it on. Still I am in favor even of this bill, because I think it is much better, both for us and the Filipinos, than we now have.

I think it is much better than to tax these people with heavy exploiting freight charges by American-built ships possessing a law-given monopoly to let even foreigners carry on the trade. But I would much rather have seen the experiment tried of American-owned free ships in that trade between the mainland of the United States and the Philippines, between the mainland of the United States and Hawaii, and between Hawaii and the Philippines, and I want to express my regret that that bill has not been brought in rather than the one that has been brought in. I do not now remember whether that bill was referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs or the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, but, at any rate, to whichever committee it was referred, it has slept the sleep.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I will say to the gentleman from Mississippi that I have no recollection of any such bill coming to the Committee on Insular Affairs.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am informed it was sent to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. The assignment was a proper one, I believe, though it might have gone to either committee, and would have stood a better chance, I believe, in the Committee on Insular Affairs. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am of the opinion we should have the right to encourage an industry by untaxing trade. I have never held to the idea you had a right to encourage it by taxing trade, but you have a right to encourage it by lightening the burdens of taxation, though not by increasing the burdens of taxation——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin has five minutes remaining.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then, Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I want to say just a word in regard to the argument for free ships which was made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY]. He spoke about the effect free ships would have. I wish to call his attention to the fact that on the Pacific coast to-day we have the three great ships of the Oceanic Line that were running across the Pacific Ocean receiving a subsidy of $283,000 a year from the Government; it had a regular trade already established, yet those ships are unable to continue to run. Now, if the American shipowner can not run ships which he already owns, where he also receives a subsidy and has a trade already established, I am unable to see how anyone can argue that he would go abroad and buy ships at any price and run them. If he can not run the ship which he already owns and which the Government helps him to run, how can the gentleman figure that he can go abroad and buy ships and run them, even if they were given to him?

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the gentleman must admit the ship that is bought cheaply will make more profit on its trade than one which is bought at a high price?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I admit that the gentleman is correct about that, but where a man already owns a ship and can not run one at a profit, and where he already has an established business, and is receiving assistance from the Government——

Mr. WILLIAMS. But if he already had it, it is because he has already bought it, and if he has already bought it, then he has got to make interest upon his plant. That is the reason why he can not run at a profit.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. But if he owns a ship, or, in other words, if a ship is given to him, and he has a ship already and can not run that at a profit, how can he run another one at a profit?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have not heard of anybody having any given to them.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. They already own the ships, have got their money invested in them, and yet can not afford to run them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I will grant the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to refer just one moment to the fact that when the bill was brought into the House, two years ago, to extend the time of the coastwise laws going into effect, at that time there were seven vessels running to the Philippines. There are now only two, and while at that time I should have opposed the bill had I known it was coming up for consideration, under present conditions I think that this bill should probably be passed. The damage was done two years ago, when the bill was introduced on one day, reported the next day, and called up in this House and passed on the third day, before any opportunity was given for anyone to be heard upon it. In addition, a similar bill had been pending before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries and was reported adversely.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, it was not the Committee on Insular Affairs which reported the bill and called it up for consideration two years ago.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman is mistaken. It was from the Insular Committee. It was introduced by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER], and my recollection is that it was introduced one day, reported the next day, and called up in the House on the third day. I know that I went to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] and asked him when the bill was going to be considered by his committee, as I would like to be heard on it, and he informed me that he was just going to call it up for passage.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] is partially right. It had taken up about four days, and the Insular Committee did report and put in the last bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. This bill ought to pass for another reason than any that has been given. It is this: We have a tariff against Philippine products of 75 per cent of the Dingley rates, and yet Congress passed this law limiting after April 1, 1909, the carrying of all freight between the United States and the Philippines to American bottoms. If anything more unfair was ever done by Congress since Congress came into existence, I have never read or heard of it—to put a tariff of 75 per cent upon products coming from the Philippines, and at the same time compel the business men of the Philippines to send them in nothing but American ships. Congress ought to have repealed this law the next day after it was passed. We now propose to do tardy justice by repealing it. Mr. Speaker, I call for a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, Shall the rules be suspended and the bill passed?

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 221, nays 4, answered "present" 11, not voting 151, as follows:

So the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

The following additional pairs were announced.

Until further notice:

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York with Mr. FULTON.

Mr. LANDIS with Mr. LEWIS.
Mr. PARKER of New Jersey with Mr. SMALL.
Mr. BATES with Mr. BRUNDIDGE.
Mr. MARSHALL with Mr. CRAVENS.
Mr. MCMILLAN with Mr. ELBERBE.
Mr. TAWNEY with Mr. BYRD.
Mr. CALDERHEAD with Mr. BURNETT.
Mr. DAVIDSON with Mr. COOPER of Texas.
Mr. KEIFER with Mr. DAVENPORT.
Mr. LAFEAN with Mr. FAYROT.
Mr. MALBY with Mr. HENRY of Texas.
Mr. NEEDHAM with Mr. LEGARE.
Mr. SMITH of Michigan with Mr. MCLAIN.
Mr. SOUTHWICK with Mr. PUJO.
For the balance of the day:
Mr. DWIGHT with Mr. SIMS.
The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

IMMIGRATION TO HAWAII.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill H. R. 10568.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10568) relating to immigration into the Territory of Hawaii.

Be it enacted, etc., That nothing in the act entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States," approved February 20, 1907, shall be taken, for a term of six years from the approval hereof, to exclude from admission to the Territory of Hawaii, as contract laborers as defined by section 2 of the said act, European aliens who have been induced or solicited to migrate to the said Territory of Hawaii by offers or promises of employment within the said Territory, held out to them by the said Territory or by the board of immigration of the said Territory, or the officers, members, or agents of such board, or to exclude from admission to the said Territory European aliens whose tickets or passages have been paid for with money of, or who have been assisted to migrate by, the said Territory or its board of immigration, or the officers, members, or agents of such board, even though it is not affirmatively shown that such European aliens' tickets or passages were not paid with money contributed to the said Territory, or its board of immigration, by individuals, companies, partnerships, or corporations: Provided, however, That nothing contained herein shall be taken to exempt European aliens induced or solicited or assisted to migrate to the said Territory, in the manner hereinbefore described, from examination and exclusion from the said Territory under any and all of the provisions other than those hereinbefore specifically mentioned of the said act of February 20, 1907.

SEC. 2. That nothing contained in the act entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States," approved February 20, 1907, shall be taken, for a term of six years from the approval hereof, to prohibit any person, company, partnership, or corporation from contributing to the said Territory of Hawaii, or to the board of immigration of said Territory, money to be used by the said Territory, or board of immigration, or the officers, members, or agents of such board, in paying the transportation, or assisting or encouraging, by printed or published advertisements or otherwise, the importation or immigration into the said Territory of European aliens in accordance with the provisions of section 1 hereof; or to attach to the contributing of money by any person, company, partnership, or corporation to the said Territory, or its board of immigration, for use in the manner hereinbefore described, or to the doing by the said board, or its officers, members, or agents, of any of the acts herein authorized, any penalty or forfeiture.

SEC. 3. That nothing herein contained shall be construed to admit to any port or place of the United States on the North American Continent any alien who is inadmissable under the provisions of the act approved May 20, 1907.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules, the Chair orders a second. The gentleman from California is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Mississippi is entitled to twenty minutes.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, this bill was introduced by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] and is reported to the House by the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, by whom I am directed to bring it up. The purpose of it is to permit the government of Hawaii to induce the immigration of white laborers into those islands. As perhaps all Members of the House know, for many years past the islands have been restricted almost entirely to oriental labor. Many years ago a large number of Chinese coolies were landed in the islands. Their number has been gradually lessening, until now they number probably not more than five or six thousand. In more recent years the people of Hawaii have chiefly depended upon Japanese labor, and to-day the Japanese constitute a majority of the inhabitants of the islands. The desire of the citizens of Hawaii is that they may have an opportunity to induce the immigration of white labor into those islands, and they are willing to pay the expenses of transportation there, thinking that it will be impossible otherwise to induce immigration of any considerable number of white laborers, since the expense of going there is so great.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. There are a good many Portuguese in the islands. Will the gentleman state about them?

Mr. HAYES. I was going to state about them. I want to say, in addition to what I have already said, that before the passage of the last immigration law the government of Hawaii had imported three shiploads of Portuguese and other south of Europe immigrants—two, I think, from Portugal and one from the Azores Islands, in the aggregate about 5,000 people. They have been there now for some time. They are all employed there, all contented, and they are making very satisfactory laborers and very satisfactory inhabitants of those islands, and this bill simply intends to permit the government of Hawaii to go on with what was done before the last immigration law passed by the Congress of the United States went into effect.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HAYES. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is the present population of the Sandwich Islands?

Mr. HAYES. I do not know the exact figures, but it is less than 200,000, I think.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is the population increasing or diminishing?

Mr. HAYES. It is increasing.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What proportion are Japs, what proportion Chinese, what proportion Kanakas, and what proportion white people?

Mr. HAYES. The proportion of Japanese in the islands is something over 50 per cent, and the proportion of Orientals is over 60 per cent of the population. I should say that of the balance, probably one-fourth, are white and the remainder Kanaka.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How do these Japs get there? Does anybody pay their expenses?

Mr. HAYES. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What right has anybody to pay their expenses?

Mr. HAYES. I do not think they have any right, but I have no doubt they are doing it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it not positively prohibited by law?

Mr. HAYES. It is.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why does not the Federal court enforce the law?

Mr. HAYES. I am not speaking for the Federal court. Nearly every one of those Japanese and Chinese coolies has his passage paid there by somebody. If it was not paid he could not come to the United States, or to Hawaii.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Do you suppose that can be proved?

Mr. HAYES. I do not suppose it can be proved except by oriental testimony, and if the gentleman has had any experience with that kind of testimony, he knows that almost anything can be proved by it that the Oriental wants to prove.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I have not had any experience with it and do not want any.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is not this the fact, that the people who are interested in bringing these laborers there go to Japan and say, "If you will go to Hawaii, I will pay your way, and then you can work out the expense when you go to work for me?"

Mr. HAYES. I have no doubt they do it in some way.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And the steamship companies know that these individuals are being carried there in that way?

Mr. HAYES. Undoubtedly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is a commonplace thing, and is it not against the law?

Mr. HAYES. Undoubtedly quite a common thing.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Where are the grand juries and Federal judges in Hawaii?

Mr. HAYES. They are there doing business.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Where is the immigration commissioner there?

Mr. HAYES. He is there doing business.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Who is running Hawaii?

Mr. HAYES. I suppose the government is running it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What government?

Mr. HAYES. The Territorial government.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. In other words, they are running it so as to bring in these people in the face of the law?

Mr. HAYES. No; I do not think the government of Hawaii can be criticised in that regard. Everybody who knows the oriental character knows that you can prove anything by oriental witnesses that they want to prove, and you can not prove anything by those witnesses that they do not want to prove.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What are you going to do about it? Are you going to turn out all the officials in Hawaii and get somebody there who will enforce the law?

Mr. HAYES. I am not speaking for the government of Hawaii.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Do you suppose the government of Hawaii has any cognizance of these things?

Mr. HAYES. I suppose they have, the same as we have, but of course they can not deal with it any more than we can, unless they can prove it or it is proved to them in an official way.

Mr. BONYNGE. Under the provisions of this bill is it not intended not only to permit the government of Hawaii to encourage immigration, but also to permit contract labor to be carried into the Hawaiian Islands?

Mr. HAYES. No, sir; it is not.

Mr. BONYNGE. If you waive the contract-labor provision in the immigration act, will it not permit the importation into the Hawaiian Islands of those under contract for labor in those islands?

Mr. HAYES. No; the law is not waived to that extent. It permits the government of Hawaii, or its immigration commissioners, to induce such immigration and to pay the expenses of those who come there.

Mr. BONYNGE. What is there to prevent the importation of contract labor except the immigration act?

Mr. HAYES. Nothing.

Mr. BONYNGE. If you waive that provision, what then will remain to prevent the importation of contract labor into the Hawaiian Islands?

Mr. HAYES. If we simply abrogated that provision there would be nothing remaining.

Mr. BONYNGE. Is not that what you do?

Mr. HAYES. No; the bill does something less than that.

Mr. BONYNGE. This bill says:

That nothing in the act entitled—

And then you go on to name the act—

shall be taken for a term of six years from the approval hereof to exclude from admission to the Territory of Hawaii as contract laborers, as defined by section 2 of the said act, European aliens who have been induced or solicited to migrate to the said Territory of Hawaii by offers or promises of employment within said Territory.

Is not that the clause prohibiting the importation of contract labor?

Mr. HAYES. No; and it is not permitted to be done by private individuals.

Mr. BONYNGE. The government of the Hawaiian Islands can contract to import laborers into the Hawaiian Islands?

Mr. HAYES. That is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. BONYNGE. That is what I asked. Now, will the gentleman answer two more questions? What is the prevailing rate of wages now in the sugar fields of the Hawaiian Islands to the Japanese?

Mr. HAYES. Twenty to twenty-five dollars a month.

Mr. BONYNGE. What was it when the Japanese first commenced to come to the islands?

Mr. HAYES. I can not answer the gentleman.

Mr. BONYNGE. Is it not a fact that it was about $8 a month?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Formerly, I think, the pay of the Japanese under the monarchy, when they came in under contract, was lower.

Mr. BONYNGE. How much did they get?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Fourteen to eighteen dollars a month.

Mr. BONYNGE. Was not it as low as $8 a month?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. I should not wonder. But, Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is not to encourage these Asiatic laborers, but to encourage white people, so that in time we will have an increase of American citizens in that country, which at the present time we have not.

Mr. BONYNGE. What is the pay of the Portuguese who are imported there under contract?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. For the last two years we have imported about 4,000 to 6,000 Portuguese and Spaniards and a few from other European nationalities.

Mr. BONYNGE. How much are they paid?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. They are not brought there under contract.

Mr. BONYNGE. How much do they get?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. As soon as they land, the planters have their agents at the immigration station, and they bring forward to them this offer, that they can have an acre or 2 acres to live on, besides getting $20 or $25 a month for their work. They work on that scale for a year or two, and at the end of that time the planter turns over to them the title in fee to the 2 acres of land that they had first settled on.

Mr. BONYNGE. I have been advised that the Portuguese were getting only $8 a month.

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. That is not correct at all. If anybody is getting low wages, it is the Asiatic.

The Portuguese and other laborers from European countries are getting from $20 to $25 a month besides having the advantage of the acre or 2 acres of land. In three years, if I recollect correctly, they have the right to work in the plantation, and at the same time they are supplied with a house, firewood, and such as that, and within that three years the planters will give them the fee-simple title to the land.

Mr. BONYNGE. You say it is not correct that the Portuguese are employed at lower wages than the Japanese?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. No; they are not. We are encouraging these men in order to get rid of the Asiatics in our country.

Mr. BONYNGE. I have been informed that the real purpose of this bill is to get the Portuguese at lower wages than they can get the Japanese for.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I understand that the Portuguese are said to be the best laborers in the islands.

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Yes.

Mr. COOK of Colorado. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from California whether the contract labor imported into the Hawaiian Islands from Portugal, China, and Japan does not come in competition with the American laborer in the gentleman's State and all other States producing beet sugar.

Mr. HAYES. I was going to explain further to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BONYNGE], and I will explain now, that the governor of Hawaii assures me that these 5,000 white immigrants were not contract laborers; that no one had any contract with them and they had no contracts to labor anywhere; that they were imported absolutely free from any obligation of any kind, but were at liberty as soon as they landed in Hawaii to make any contracts with anybody that they chose.

Mr. COOK of Colorado. Is it not a fact that the sugar producers in the Hawaiian Islands pay the transportation of this cheap labor?

Mr. HAYES. The government did pay the transportation of the 5,000 immigrants from Europe to which I have referred.

Mr. COOK of Colorado. Our Government?

Mr. HAYES. The Territorial government of Hawaii. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, it seems hard in this House to get consideration for legislation in favor of American labor before the House. It seems easy to get legislation considered that strikes a blow at American labor. This bill strikes down the contract-labor law so far as the islands of Hawaii are concerned. This hurts in the first place the negro laborers of Louisiana who are earning wages upon the sugar plantations there by bringing into quick and easy competition with them contract laborers to raise sugar in Hawaii and to put that sugar upon the American market without any tariff between Hawaii and the United States, and, of course, in competition with these American citizens, negro laborers, in the State of Louisiana. It is a blow, in the second place, though more remotely, at all American labor in the United States, because, notwithstanding the last would-be saving clause of the bill, which says, that "nothing herein contained shall be construed to admit to any part or place of the United States on the North American continent any alien who is inadmissible under the provisions of the act approved May 20, 1907," it would be absolutely a physical impossibility after this bill once passes to prevent these people, having once been settled for a considerable length of time in Hawaii, from crossing the Pacific Ocean to the States upon the Pacific coast. So that, having raised the barrier, they would finally all come here that chose to come.

The idea under this bill is to get cheap Portuguese labor in the Hawaiian Islands upon the sugar plantations there. The very object of it is to get a cheaper labor. Now, the pretext made for it is that the law excluding contract labor is now being violated, as far as the Japanese immigrants into Hawaii are concerned. It is never sound doctrine to repeal a law, if it be a good law with regard to some, because others are violating it. If contract alien labor is entering into Hawaii, whether in the shape of Japanese, Chinese, or Europeans, the proper remedy is to enforce the law and stop it; and if the immigration commissioners now charged with that duty are not performing that duty in the Hawaiian Islands, then it is for this Administration to replace them with others who will perform that duty, or else for the American people to replace the Administration with an Administration that will appoint somebody who will perform the duty of executing the immigration laws. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, I now yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT], a member of the committee reporting the bill.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I was not present at the time of the consideration of this bill by the Committee on Immigration. I knew nothing of the fact that it was being considered or was pending before the committee until I found that it had been reported by the committee. I then stated to the gentleman who reported it that I would not support the bill and that I believed it vicious. I believe that it is an attack upon the contract-labor system, or the prohibition of laborers coming in under that system, and it is a step toward breaking it down. If you gentlemen are prepared on either side to take a step to annul that salutary legislation, you have the opportunity to do it now. It is up to you to do it or not to do it. As a member of the Immigration Commission I visited the Azores last spring and found that individuals under the guise of the Hawaiian government had been there getting laborers to go to Hawaii in violation of our contract-labor law. Mr. Speaker, there were those who believed that under the rulings of the Attorney-General in the South Carolina case our law was not stringent enough, and at the last session of Congress a law was passed forbidding the States to engage in this very business.

And yet here is a bill allowing the Territory of Hawaii to do just this very thing. Mr. Speaker, I believe that that is wrong, because I think that the contract-labor law is right; and if that is true, then any innovation, any attack upon it from any direction, is wrong. Why, it might just as well be said that in California, where thousands of Japanese are coming over every year and settling in that country—that that section might make the same appeal in order to get white laborers to drive out this foreign labor. The same argument might be made for both. It is simply an assault upon the white laborers of the country. Mr. Speaker, if they would pay the white laborers of America wages enough, they could get them to go there, and it is all a pretext and subterfuge, in my opinion, to say that these people are being taken there for the purpose of driving out the Japanese or for the purpose of having more white people there than Japanese.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. BURNETT. Certainly.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Is it true that certain States in the South are making arrangements for the importation of laborers from Europe for employment in the South now?

Mr. BURNETT. If the gentleman had remembered about the last immigration bill that was passed, he would have recollected that that was being done by the State of South Carolina, and under the ruling of the Attorney-General was permitted at that time, and the amendment that I have referred to was for the purpose of preventing the States from doing this very thing.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Did they displace labor to any extent?

Mr. BURNETT. It was displeasing to many who believed too many of that very class of people were coming to the South——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I asked if they displaced labor to any extent.

Mr. BURNETT. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I misunderstood your question.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. I asked the gentleman if they displaced labor.

Mr. BURNETT. No; they did not displace labor to a very great extent, for there was work for all of them there; but these very men who were then being brought in, since the hard times have come, have taken the wings of the morning and flown away, and carried their money with them, or else they are paupers depending upon the people in many communities to keep them from starving. This at least is the case in my section. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And you will find the same trouble here. Hawaii is going to be populated gradually, and are we bettering the thing by placing there the Italians or the Spaniards or the people from the Azores who are Portuguese side by side with the Japanese? You can not obtain white men or Americans to go there to make contracts to perform that labor when at every stage they have to come in contact with some of the men from the Mediterranean Sea or the Atlantic Ocean that belong to the Iberic race, different from the white people of our own blood; and, Mr. Speaker, I desire here and now to enter my protest against this entering wedge—because that is what it is. If you come up with this kind of a plausible pretext for it in this case, then the next thing you would hear is that some other country needs to be filled up with some other industrious people, and therefore you must open the flood gates in order to let men come in under contract to afford this labor. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, in the first place, I believe that the laws against the importation of contract labor into the United States are absolutely right and ought to be enforced rigidly. In the second place, if the United States courts and the district attorneys and marshals and immigration officers in Hawaii are not enforcing the laws they ought to be "fired" and a new set put in who will enforce the laws. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am in favor of rooting the Chinese, Japanese, and all other Orientals whatsoever out of the Hawaiian Islands and making that a place for white men to live. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, let us see what this bill provides for. I am teetotally opposed to making these islands over there the breeding ground for a mongrel lot of foreigners who are going to put our own people out of employment. Now, what does this bill provide? This is the most transparent trick I have ever seen in my lifetime. In the first place, it authorizes the authorities of the Sandwich Islands to practically suspend the laws against contract laborers in the Sandwich Islands for six years. On the face of it that may seem fair to the uninitiated, but on page 2, in line 6, if you will read the clause beginning with the word "even," you will find the "joker" in this bill. Here it is:

Even though it is not affirmatively shown that such European aliens' tickets or passages were not paid with money contributed to the said Territory or its board of immigration by individuals, companies, partnerships, or corporations.

What does that mean? Why, it means that these corporations, the big sugar planters, and the corporations that run them, shall contribute this money to get these laborers over there and be the beneficiaries of it. If you do not believe that, read the second section of the bill. It makes it absolutely plain. It is as follows:

SEC. 2. That nothing contained in the act entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States," approved February 20, 1907, shall be taken, for a term of six years from the approval hereof, to prohibit any person, company, partnership, or corporation from contributing to the said Territory of Hawaii, or to the board of immigration of said Territory, money to be used by the said Territory, or board of immigration, or the officers, members, or agents of such board, in paying the transportation—of these fellows. That gives the whole thing away. It is just as clear as crystal that the whole object of this bill is to enable the big corporations which run the great sugar plantations in the Hawaiian Islands to get a lot of cheap labor in there for their own benefit, under the guise of having it done by the constituted authorities of the Sandwich Islands.

We have enough trouble here at home now. I saw it stated in a newspaper the other day—I do not know whether it is a lie or the truth—that there are 4,500,000 people out of employment in the United States at this very minute. I take it that that is an exaggeration, but suppose half of it or two-thirds of it is true. Then, as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] suggested, a gentleman who is on this Immigration Committee and also on the Immigration Commission sent abroad to investigate the subject, let us keep these "cheap Johns" out of the Sandwich Islands; shut the Japanese out, shut the Chinese out, and our own laborers will go to those islands and work the rich land. That is precisely what I want to see. [Applause.] The rest of you can do as you please——

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin and Mr. PADGETT rose.

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield first to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I have been unable to procure a copy of the bill, but I notice in the report this language:

That nothing herein contained shall be construed to admit to any port or place in the United States on the North American Continent any alien who is inadmissible under the provisions of the act approved May 20, 1907.

What act was approved May 20, 1907? We adjourned on the 4th of March.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not know. That may be a typographical error.

Mr. PADGETT. The gentleman is speaking about the idle. Here is a report, an official document, from New York.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How many does it give?

Mr. PADGETT. It gives an itemized statement there.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I have not time to read it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will give one minute more to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, Mr. Speaker, after full argument in this House, first and last, we all came to the conclusion—I do not know that there was any party matter mixed up in it, and it was the best judgment of this House and the best judgment of the Senate—that the laws against importing contract laborers into this country were correct, and they are correct. I was in favor of them before they were ever passed. I am in favor of them now. This bill is just simply the opening wedge to nullify the law that we have been operating under and that we were all in favor of, and that is the test right here now. A man that votes for this bill is in favor of contract labor, and the man that votes against it is against contract labor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, how much time has this side left?

The SPEAKER. There are six minutes remaining.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How much has the affirmative?

The SPEAKER. Six minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] propose to occupy that entire six minutes in one speech?

Mr. HAYES. No, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then, will you yield to somebody on that side?

Mr. HAYES. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] four minutes.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I wish we had time to properly consider this bill. Those who seem to be against it proceed upon the idea that they know all about the conditions in the Hawaiian Territory. They talk as though the conditions that they are familiar with at home exist there. They talk as though they would like to dedicate those islands to our own American laborers who are employed here at very high wages comparatively. It is impossible to do that. The situation in the Hawaiian Territory for some purposes is exceedingly unfortunate. Our laborers will not go to the island, and until conditions entirely change there they never will. They can get better wages under better circumstances at home.

The central idea of the bill is to secure white European labor into the Hawaiian Territory to become permanent settlers and to take the place of Japanese or Chinese laborers. And the bill also looks to a method of procuring white or European laborers to secure the more certain development of these rich islands, and to discourage the emigration of a worse class of residents.

The islands are well adapted to raising fruit, pineapples, and oranges, and all things of that kind, but there is no general or foreign market for such fruit because they are so far away from a country that would consume it, and their sales can only be to their own people and to the ships that come into their harbors. These islands can not compete with California in selling fruit to the people in the States. They are too remote and the transportation by water is too slow. The whole of the islands, and they are rich islands, are chiefly adapted to raising sugar. No ordinary farmers of usual qualifications will or can go there to cultivate the cane or anything else on any considerable scale. The cane growth is the best growth of course, but that is impossible with men of ordinary means. Most all the great cane fields there cost a million or more dollars in preparation and for canals or ditches for irrigation before you can raise any cane on them at all. On some of those great canals and ditches they have spent $3,000,000 before they got the water on the cane fields. Without an adequate supply of water in general, the lands are valueless. The owners of the lands in these rich islands can not get the kind of laborers they ought to have. I went over the Kona district, in the western part of the great island of Hawaii, which is largely grown up with coffee trees, every one looking perfect, not a blasted leaf, not a stem that did not have coffee upon it. Everything looked prosperous, but everybody looked dejected, and why? Because there was not enough labor in that region to harvest one-tenth of the coffee that was growing in that district.

Mr. McGAVIN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. McGAVIN. Being with the same party that the gentleman went out with——

Mr. KEIFER. In the same wagon.

Mr. McGAVIN (continuing). I will ask him if it is not a fact that with many of the sugar planters there was a demand for this cheaper labor from Asia, but among the people of the Hawaiian Islands generally there was a positive and most emphatic opposition?

Mr. KEIFER. There was against Asiatic labor, but in favor of the kind of labor this bill is intended to bring into the Islands.

Mr. McGAVIN. I will ask if it is not a matter of common knowledge in the Hawaiian Islands that these Japanese and Chinese were being imported from the Hawaiian Islands up to Nova Scotia and then down into the United States? [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KEIFER. I did not go into that question. I do not believe it was so. The people in the Hawaiian Islands, Japanese, Chinese, and all, have plenty of employment in every direction, and they were not seeking other places of employment. In general, the Japanese and Chinese do not remain long in the island, but go home after a few prosperous years.

Mr. COOK of Colorado. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio whether or not he is in favor of the importation of contract labor, either Japanese, Chinese, or Portuguese, to work in the fields in his district or State? [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. KEIFER. If we had that subject up I might consider it. Of course not. In this bill we are not attempting to deal with that question. My district is not a district at all like the Hawaiian Islands, and the conditions do not exist there that exist in Ohio. Now, I am in favor of some labor there. American labor does not go there. The American farmer can not go there, because he can not live under the conditions that now exist there. If you are going to make those Islands productive you must get labor from where it can be had. No amount of wages will induce the laborers of any of the States of the United States to go to these islands. I am not in favor of having Japanese labor and Chinese labor go there or anywhere else, but I am in favor of getting white labor if it has to come from Portugal, Spain, or South America, or wherever it may come from, to go there to take the place of the Asiatic laborers. I am in favor of building up that country so that it may be equal to all its opportunities.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. BONYNGE. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this bill, because, in my judgment, its principle is absolutely wrong. I do not think it is necessary to be familiar with conditions in the Hawaiian Islands to determine whether or not we are in favor of the passage of this bill. Every Member upon the floor of this House, upon both sides of the middle aisle, has declared in favor of the provision prohibiting the importation of contract labor. [Applause.] This bill, by section 2, absolutely suspends that provision of the law in reference to the Hawaiian Islands, and permits corporations and others engaged in sugar production in the Hawaiian Islands to contribute money to the Hawaiian authorities for the purpose of importing into those islands cheap labor. It will not do, Mr. Speaker, to attempt to fool the House of Representatives by asking us to believe that these sugar planters are desirous of contributing that money to the treasury of the Hawaiian Islands for any philanthropic purpose. They are doing it because they will be enabled thereby to get cheaper labor than they otherwise could.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the sugar made in the Hawaiian Islands is admitted to the United States free of duty. They have an advantage now over the sugar producers of the United States, because sugar can be produced in the islands cheaper than in the United States, and they want an additional advantage, by being able to get cheaper labor there than we can in the United States; and that is the milk in the cocoanut in this bill, and nothing else.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to another fundamental objection to the bill. It is true that section 3 provides that nothing in the bill shall be construed to admit those who have been imported into the Hawaiian Islands to come to the United States; but everyone knows, who will give it a moment's consideration, that if this contract labor is admitted into the Hawaiian Islands, it will be impossible to keep that same labor out of continental United States. They will work their way to continental United States, and the Hawaiian Islands will be the gateway through which contract labor can be imported not only into those islands but into the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. I now yield one-half of one minute to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA].

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this bill, because I believe it is a discrimination in favor of large interests and against labor. I live in a community where labor is very hard to get and where we have to pay as high as $3 a day for harvest men. Why not give to the small farmer, with the small acreage, the same opportunity to get his work done as you are giving to the people who own these large plantations? [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. I now yield the remaining two minutes and a half to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES] has introduced a bill to exclude the Japanese from California. He is willing to have alien European labor come in by way of the Hawaiian Islands. If the House passes both his bills, he gets the benefit "coming and going." I wish to call the attention of the House to this fact, that this bill will not accomplish what its authors desire. Several shiploads of Portuguese farmers were brought to the Hawaiian Islands. They were employed there by the sugar planters. Because of the conditions and the terms of employment it was a notorious fact, evident to everybody in the islands when I was there last summer, that just as quickly as those men could accumulate the price of passage to this continent, they immediately embarked for the United States. The Portuguese are home seekers, they are home builders; they wish to acquire a small tract of land and to build and own their own homes. In those families where it was impossible for the heads of families, because of the drastic conditions under which they were employed by the sugar planters, to accumulate enough money to take their families of five or six to the United States, the young men, as soon as they reached the age of 21, left the employment of the sugar planters and went into other fields, and as soon as they could get sufficient money, or if they could get employment of any character upon a ship coming to the coast, they took passage and came here.

This bill should be entitled "A bill to permit the sugar planters of the Hawaiian Islands to legalize peonage," because that will be its effect. Until some change is made in the Hawaiian Islands, so that the home seeker, the man who desires to acquire his acre or 2 acres and to build his own house and establish his own home for his family, is permitted to do so, then it is a wrong to permit men to be brought to the Hawaiian Islands with their families and practically placed in perpetual slavery and bondage to the sugar planters. [Applause.] I hope the bill will be defeated.

Mr. HAYES. I now yield one minute to the gentleman from Hawaii [Mr. KALANIANAOLE].

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Mr. Speaker, much has been said about the Americanizing of the islands of Hawaii. How can you do it? As it is to-day the islands are open to any American citizen who will come there. Since the annexation of the islands, what has been done in the way of the settlement by Americans from the mainland going to Hawaii? Nothing whatever has been done. Everything has been given in the way of inducements to encourage your people to go to those islands, but has that been successful? Not so far as farmers and agricultural laborers are concerned. Why do they not come down there? There are many thousands of acres of land there that are open to American citizens if they will only come down there. But we are so far from mainland markets that the American farmer and laborer thinks he can do better for himself in the States than he can in Hawaii. Since we can not get them to come, what are we going to do? I, as an American, am in hearty sympathy with American ideas on the subject of labor. If any Americans there are being driven out, it is not by Europeans, but by Asiatic cheap labor. [Applause.]

Now, we, as American citizens, want to do away with these conditions as they are there to-day. We want more laborers who are citizens or eligible to become citizens. There is no other way unless we get you to come down and settle our country; and if you can not come, or will not come, we must get people who will come and who will in time be American citizens that you will be proud of, and these people are the Europeans. [Applause.]

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, I think I am as thoroughly in favor of the contract-labor law and its rigid enforcement as any gentleman on the other side of the House, and helped to frame the present law on that subject; but that question is not involved in this bill. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET].

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, that probably is just enough time for me to say that, differing as I do with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] on the immigration question, I agree with him on this. The condition of the Hawaiian Islands is simply this: There is no white labor to speak of, and the native race represented by the gentleman from Hawaii, who has just spoken, is decreasing. There are 60,000 Japanese in the islands, 8,000 of them veteran soldiers of the war between Russia and Japan. Why that 8,000 are there I leave the answer to your imagination. The sentiment of the American citizens there is in favor of white people, but they can not get them. They have been getting them, but we passed an act which prevents them from getting any more. I am in favor of their getting every white man they can and keeping out the Japanese laborer.

My friend from Colorado [Mr. BONYNGE] says that we want cheap labor. The labor they get from the Portuguese islands costs more money than the Asiatic labor. They are now bringing in dearer labor, and they are willing to pay more for it because they are paying it to white men.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were yeas 19; nays 186; answered "present" 15; not voting 167; as follows:

So the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill was rejected.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

For the balance of the day:

Mr. ELLIS of Missouri with Mr. ROBINSON.

Mr. HOWELL of New Jersey with Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina.

Until further notice:

Mr. CURRIER with Mr. LEVER.

Mr. BUTLER with Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia.

Mr. STERLING with Mr. BRODHEAD.

Mr. LANING with Mr. ASHBROOK.

Mr. FOSTER of Indiana with Mr. GRANGER.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey with Mr. WOLF.

Mr. CONNER with Mr. COCKRAN.

Mr. FORDNEY with Mr. FAVROT.

Mr. GREENE with Mr. FORNES.

Mr. HAUGEN with Mr. GREGG.

Mr. HAYES with Mr. LEGARE.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa with Mr. MCDERMOTT.

For the session:

Mr. WANGER with Mr. ADAMSON.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I voted "no." I desire to change that vote to "present," on account of being paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER].

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. AMES). The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia, and he answered "present."

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I voted "no." I am paired with the gentleman from Missouri, and I desire to be recorded as being "present."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. ROBINSON, and he answered "present."

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HOWELL]. I voted "no." I desire to withdraw that vote and vote "present."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina, and he answered "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

OREGON AND CALIFORNIA RAILROAD LAND GRANT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and adopt the following order, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That immediately upon the adoption of this order the joint resolution (S. R. 48) authorizing the Attorney-General to institute certain suits, etc., shall be read in the House and one amendment thereto may thereupon be offered, and said resolution and amendment shall be considered in general debate for not exceeding three hours, at the end of which time a vote shall be taken, first, upon the amendment if any be offered, and thereafter a vote shall be taken on the final passage of the resolution, amended or unamended as the case then shall be, without intervening motion or question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Has the Committee on Rules been abolished?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The rules are such that a majority of the House can have its way. [Applause on the Republican side.] Is a second demanded?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule a second is ordered, and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] to twenty minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, this is a Senate resolution authorizing the Attorney-General to institute suits for the purpose of enforcing all of the rights and remedies of the United States in the matter of certain land grants. The resolution as it is now presented to the House was, as I understand, prepared by the Attorney-General, and comes to us with the unanimous indorsement of the other body, and is reported to the House practically unanimously from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman means the Senate resolution, and not this resolution or order has been practically unanimously reported.

Mr. MONDELL. This is the Senate resolution. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the House that this matter has had an unusual amount of consideration. Our committee had numerous hearings in regard to it. We heard all interested parties who expressed a desire to be heard. We had before us the officials of the Attorney-General's Office who had investigated the present status of these land grants. Various amendments were proposed. All were carefully discussed and considered, and the committee agreed, as I say, practically unanimously to report the resolution to the House unamended.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. This is the Pacific Railroad land grant that is aimed at?

Mr. MONDELL. This is what is known as the "Oregon and California land grant." I shall come to that in a moment. Mr. Speaker, this resolution has to do with certain large grants of land, the history of which I shall give to the House very briefly.

In 1866 a grant of land was made by Congress to aid in the construction of a railroad from Portland, Oreg., to a connection with the Central Pacific road in California. By reason of noncompliance with the terms of the grant it became necessary for Congress two years later to provide for an extension of the grant, and again, the conditions of the grant not having been fulfilled, a further extension of the grant was had in the year 1869, and at that time an amendment was made to the original grant, which amendment forms the basis of the action now proposed, and it is, therefore, exceedingly important. That amendment was as follows:

That the lands granted by the act aforesaid shall be sold to actual settlers only in quantities not greater than one-quarter section to one purchaser and for a price not exceeding $2.50 per acre.

Before I discuss the question of the manner in which the railroad company proceeded to dispose of the grant I desire to call attention to the fact that the resolution also treats of another and a smaller grant made in aid of a railway from Portland to Astoria and McMinnville, in Oregon, and also a grant made to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military road from Coos Bay, on the coast, to the town of Roseburg. The grant to what became the California and Oregon Railway amounted approximately to 3,000,000 acres including the small amount which was included in the McMinnville grant. The grant in aid of the military road amounted to about 100,000 acres. Mr. Speaker, these roads were not constructed in accordance with the terms of the grant, but Congress waiving the right of forfeiture for failure to construct within the time limit fixed in the grant and the roads having finally been completed, the Interior Department began to patent the land to the railroad company. For a time the lands were sold in substantial compliance with the conditions of the grant—that is, they were sold to persons claiming to be settlers in tracts not to exceed 160 acres and for not more than $2.50 an acre. Approximately 127,000 acres were so sold in substantial compliance with the terms of the grant.

There came to be, some years after the grant was made, something of a demand for the lands on the part of those who desired larger areas than 160 acres, and the companies holding the grants began to sell their lands in larger areas than 160 acres and at a price in excess of $2.50 an acre. The Oregon and California Company and its successors in interest continued this policy of selling the lands in larger areas and for a higher price and entirely ignored the provision requiring the land to be sold to actual settlers. So it came about that there was eventually sold of the Oregon and California grant of nearly 3,000,000 acres approximately 600,000 acres in violation of all the conditions of the grant.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. When this violation of law took place why was not complaint made? Why did it not become the duty of the Attorney-General or the United States district attorney to institute suit and compel the proper carrying out of the law? Why is it necessary now to direct the Attorney-General by resolution to proceed to enforce the law of the United States?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I expect to reach the last question proposed by the gentleman from Kansas in just a moment, but answering the first question, I would say that it occurs to me it would have been right and proper for the officials of the Government to have called attention to the fact that the terms of the grant were being violated. Why they did not do this, I am not informed.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman please read to the House the proposed amendment? There are a good many inquiries over here, and we would like to know what it is.

Mr. MONDELL. I will say to the gentleman I have not myself seen the proposed amendment except to have a very hurried glance at it, and I do not know its exact form. I presume it will be offered by the gentleman from Michigan for the information of the House very shortly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, we are fixing an order here to consider an amendment that no one knows anything about except one or two people.

Mr. MONDELL. The amendment must be before the House for three hours, I will say to the gentleman. Under this rule the amendment must be offered the moment this order is adopted.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to inquire whether it will be in order to offer another amendment to recover for grants in New Mexico obtained by the Santa Fe Railroad? Would it be in order to amend and include the Santa Fe Railroad Company's lands unlawfully secured in New Mexico and held away from actual settlers?

Mr. MONDELL. It will not. I wish the gentleman would not take up my time. I have not very much time, and I am anxious to discuss this matter so that others will understand it. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, would it interrupt the gentleman to inquire of him how this land-grant law was violated? Who owns these lands now acquired in pursuance of that violation of law?

Mr. MONDELL. Possibly the gentleman has not been here during my discussion of the matter.

Mr. CLAYTON. No; I confess I have not.

Mr. MONDELL. I will say to the gentleman that there are three limitations. The land shall be sold in tracts not to exceed 160 acres, at a price not to exceed $2.50 an acre, and to actual settlers, and from the time the grant was made down to the present time practically all of those limitations have been ignored by the companies claiming the grants whenever it was to their interest to ignore them, and large areas of lands have been sold in very large tracts.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I would like, if possible, to make a brief statement of the facts, as I think I can present the matter to the House better in that way. I will be very glad to yield to the gentleman a little later.

Mr. Speaker, as I said a moment ago, approximately 600,000 acres of these lands were sold in violation of the terms of the contract. They were sold in tracts as large as 45,000 acres to one corporation.

Mr. CLAYTON. Who owns them now?

Mr. MONDELL. Over 2,000,000 acres are still held by the railroad company and about 800,000 acres are held and claimed by the purchasers from the railroad company.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Harriman owns the most of them, I can tell the gentleman.

Mr. MONDELL. One of these purchases amounts to 45,000 acres, and it was made at, approximately, $10 per acre. Other purchases were made of less acreages at a somewhat lower price, but in the aggregate, as I said a moment ago, 600,000 acres of these lands have been sold in violation of all the conditions and terms of the grant. Now, about two years ago the railroad company, the Central Pacific having succeeded to the ownership of the Oregon and California Company, and therefore to the ownership of these lands, adopted a policy of retaining the lands from sale—of making no sales whatever. So long as the company was selling the lands, even though in large blocks and at high prices, the public sentiment in the region of these grants was not aroused against the violations of the terms of the grant to the extent that it has been since the railroad company refused to sell the lands to anybody at any price. Mr. Harriman has declared that it is the intention of his company to retain these lands, largely timbered lands, in the hands of the company indefinitely, to establish a permanent estate.

Now, the effect upon the State of Oregon can be readily understood when you take into consideration the fact that these lands constitute an area nearly as large as the State of Maryland, with the alternate sections of the public lands lying in the same area. And now that the railroad company has ceased to sell this land, the industries of that vast region have practically been brought to a standstill, except as the lumbering industry is being carried on on some of the lands which have been sold. It is practically impossible for the people of southwestern Oregon to develop their country by reason of the fact that the railroad company, the owner of the alternate sections, refuses to dispose of them, and it is practically impossible to develop the Government sections with the railroad sections thus held in a single ownership.

The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] asked me a moment ago why this resolution is presented. It is presented because it is the opinion of the Attorney-General that Congress alone can declare a forfeiture, and that Congress alone can authorize proceedings with a view of declaring a forfeiture. All other rights and remedies the Government now has, save alone the remedy of forfeiture, and this resolution is presented for the purpose of giving to the Attorney-General the right to institute suit to declare a forfeiture of the railroad land grant, and at the same time to set up all other rights and remedies of the Government in the premises. Remember that the railroad company still holds approximately 2,000,000 acres of this land.

That means an estate larger than Delaware by 25 per cent, if I remember correctly the area of that Commonwealth, and, with the alternate Government sections, represents an area, as I said a moment ago, as large as Maryland—a territory tied up so its development is practically at a standstill except as the lumber business is carried on by those who have purchased from the railroad company, by reason of this policy established by the Union and Central Pacific Railway interests.

When this condition of affairs is taken into consideration, it is patent that some action should be taken for the purpose of determining whether or no the railroad companies now holding these lands under the grant have a right to permanently withhold them from settlement and development.

That question has been raised, not by adverse action of the Government, but by the policy of the company, first, in selling the lands in large blocks contrary to the provisions of the grant, and later in refusing to sell them under any conditions, and it is absolutely essential, not only in the interest of the people at large, in the interest of the Government which placed these limitations upon the grant, but in the interest of the purchasers from the railroad company themselves, that suit be instituted to settle the question of title.

Public sentiment in the region has been so thoroughly aroused, attention has been so emphatically and persistently called to the limitations of the grant, all titles under the grant have been so sharply called in question, the titles of all holders are so continuously challenged and insecure, and the rights of the company to hold the land so challenged, that proceedings in the courts are essential and necessary to the quieting of all titles claimed under the grant.

It is claimed on behalf of the Government that the limitations contained in the grant are in the nature of conditions subsequent, and that a breach of these conditions by the railroad company renders the grant liable to forfeiture. Forfeiture can only be asserted through action by Congress. Hence the necessity of the resolution which authorizes the Attorney-General to institute proceedings for the purpose of establishing all of the rights and remedies of the Government, including that of forfeiture. It is of course possible that the courts will not hold that the lands are subject to forfeiture, in which event the Government, through the Attorney-General, can still assert its other rights and remedies, including that of demanding specific performance by the companies, or, in other words, a compliance with the terms of the grant as to the lands now unsold.

It is so patent to some of the purchasers under these grants that their titles can never be made secure until proceedings have been had for the purpose of setting at rest the questions in controversy, that the present holders of the grant made in aid of the Coos Bay military road, holding practically the entire grant for that road of approximately 90,000 acres, have requested the Attorney-General in writing that suits be instituted by the Government for the purpose of determining what their rights are.

The resolution as it passed the Senate and as reported from the Public Lands Committee ought to be passed without amendment, because the amendment proposed is almost certain to defeat the Government in its attempt to assert its rights and remedies against the railroad companies that are the present holders of the grants. If the conditions contained in the grant were conditions subsequent, then it is very doubtful if the Government can assert, successfully, its claim for a forfeiture by reason of a breach of these conditions if in advance we confirm the very sales by which the conditions of the grant were breached, and no amendments—least of all, no such amendment as has been proposed—is necessary to protect the rights of bona fide purchasers, for such rights will and must be preserved by the courts in the suits in equity which will be brought by the Attorney-General under this resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is recognized.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am opposed to the adoption of this order. I wish to call the attention of the House to the existing order. Up to this time we have been operating in a manner under which no amendment could be offered to anything brought before the House. At last light has penetrated the minds of those in control of the organization here, and now they have condescended to permit a bill to be brought before the House and to permit one amendment to be offered to the bill. I wish to congratulate the Speaker of the House upon the fact, as the Speaker announced that under the rules now adopted the majority can do as it pleases. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a very brief explanation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman has consumed twenty minutes; I only wish to talk a few minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. I simply want to say to the gentleman that I have made inquiry among the Members of the House, and it is believed an opportunity to offer one amendment would be sufficient.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I decline to yield. The gentleman did not ask whether I wished to offer any amendment to this resolution. I have just as much right to consider resolutions and to offer amendments as the gentleman and those who are interested in some particular phase of the question.

I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that yesterday I stated that the Speaker was the whole business in this House. This resolution demonstrates it. [Laughter.] The Committee on Rules yesterday slipped up; the mechanism was not well geared; instead of having forty minutes' debate on a rule, we had eighty minutes. The Speaker evidently made up his mind not to trust it again; the committee had gotten so rusty that he would not trust them again. So he handed this order or rule to an outsider, one who has not been permitted to sit within the sacred circle up to this time—an outsider on the subject of rules—to move to suspend the rules and pass the order now before the House. Poor old Committee on Rules. [Laughter.] No more will they be able to get up before us and say, "I offer a privileged report." The Speaker will take no more chances. [Laughter.] The crown has been snatched from the head of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. [Laughter.] He has been banished and relegated to oblivion until he freshens up a rusty memory and becomes familiar with the practices—the practices in a Republican House under a Republican set of rules [laughter and applause on the Democratic side]—so that when the Speaker pulls the string the marionettes will work in harmony with his wish.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I hope the gentleman will not intrude in the discussion of this order anything relating to the merits of the resolution to be considered under this rule.

Mr. MONDELL. I object to the gentleman referring to me as "an outsider." [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I tender my sincere apologies to the gentleman from Wyoming, and I congratulate him and the House that to-morrow he will appear here as radiant as Solomon in all his glory, bedecked with one of the selected carnations reserved for the "big five of the House." [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, of course anybody who is familiar with the rules of the House, who understands their simplicity, who realizes how easy it is for the majority to do business under the rules, who appreciates the value of the Committee on Rules to the organization of the House, must protest against this outrage, perpetrated, not upon the minority of the House, but perpetrated against that sacred, omnipotent, Committee on Rules.

I wish to voice the resentment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [laughter]; I wish to enter his emphatic protest against the scandalous manner in which he, who has reveled in the delight of running roughshod over the minority of this House, has been ruthlessly set aside by a Republican Speaker. How outraged he now looks when he finds that his crown has been stolen and that the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands is substituted for him as the man who shall hold the throttle and make this perfect organism go!

Now, Mr. Speaker, how much time have I used?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before the gentleman sits down——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not going to sit down. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used five minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wanted to ask the gentleman if it had occurred to him that, perhaps, the real reason for the adoption of this procedure was to prevent my colleague, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND], and myself, the minority members of the committee, from running over the Speaker and the other members of the committee?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why, just now, under the leadership of the gentleman from Mississippi, the House by an overwhelming vote defeated one of the privileged motions that was introduced and was thought would be adopted by this House. Naturally, the Speaker took no chances. [Laughter.]

Now, let me read from these sacred rules:

> The following-named committees shall have leave to report at any time on the matters herein stated, viz:
> The Committee on Rules, on rules, joint rules, and order of business.

I understand, Mr. Speaker, why the Speaker would not permit the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] to offer this resolution. It would be too offensive for the Speaker to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to offer a resolution that would permit even a single amendment to be offered to anything before the House. [Laughter.] His specialty is to bring in resolutions and orders that will prevent anything being done except the minority obtaining their constitutional right to call the roll; and if even this slight condescension was to be given, not to the minority, but to a Member of the majority, that he be permitted to offer an amendment, the gentleman from Pennsylvania would resent that as an intrusion upon his rights and would insist that no amendment be offered at all.

This illustrates what a farce it is for the gentleman from Pennsylvania, at the opening of the session, before anybody has had time to read the rules, to stand up here and tell his side of the House that they are the most perfect system ever devised. Hereafter the gentleman from Pennsylvania will bear in mind that this tyrannical power lodged in the Speaker will be used against him, just as it will be against the most humble Member on this side; and whenever he slips up, whenever he misbehaves, whenever he grows rusty, that the power will be taken from him and some other Member of the majority elevated to the high place that he now occupies.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to yield five minutes of the time left to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] and the balance of the time to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] in whichever order they prefer to take it. How much time is there remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Eleven minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY].

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has said, if this resolution is enacted into law without amendment it will authorize the Attorney-General of the United States to proceed in a court of equity to forfeit all lands granted to the California and Oregon Railroad Company, all lands granted to the Military Wagon Road Company—that company built a wagon road from Coos Bay to Roseburg in Oregon—128,000 acres of land granted and patented to a railroad company known as the Portland, Astoria and McMinnville Railroad; in all, Mr. Speaker, about 3,300,000 acres of land, 915,000 acres of which have been sold by these companies to individuals, to corporations, and to lumbermen in that State.

Mr. Speaker, practically all of the lands that have been sold by these companies to present holders have been patented. Some 2,800,000 acres of land were patented to the California and Oregon Railroad Company. There is due that company yet some 300,000 acres of land for which they have not received patents. What I will show if I am given time to-morrow in general debate is this, that there are 127,000 acres of those lands sold by the California and Oregon Railroad Company to individuals, strictly in compliance with the terms of the granting act; that is to say, that they have been sold in quantities not exceeding 160 acres, and to actual settlers, and at a price not exceeding $2.50 per acre.

The Assistant Attorney-General representing the Government in opposition to this bill before the Committee on the Public Lands stated that there had been 173,000 acres of those lands sold in quantities not exceeding 160 acres to actual settlers, but at prices slightly in excess of $2.50 cents per acre. The balance of 815,000 acres of those lands sold by the railroad company have been sold in quantities in excess of 160 acres and at prices exceeding $2.50 per acre.

Let me say to you briefly, gentlemen, that there are 250 sawmills in the State of Oregon, cutting timber from those lands, employing 8,000 men and cutting 600,000,000 feet of lumber annually. On those lands are large sawmills and lumbering operations; railroads constructed from the mills into the lumber woods to haul the timber to the mills, and in some instances villages consisting of more than a thousand people situated on those lands that have been sold by this company, all of which this resolution proposes to forfeit to the Government.

Those people have purchased these lands, purchased them without knowledge of any limitations or restrictions whatever as to their disposition. I have here and will show to-morrow an abstract of title taken from Crook County, Oreg., records, where patents were recorded by the Government which refer to the act of 1866 only, and nowhere do these patents refer to the act of 1869, which act contains the limitations as to the quantity and price, and as to whom it should be sold. And when these people went to the abstractor in Crook County and obtained an abstract of title it showed an absolutely clear title from the Government to the parties whom they purchased from, and on the strength of that abstract and by the advice of the best legal talent that could be had, they paid the consideration and took the land. Now you propose by this resolution to authorize the Attorney-General to go into court and cancel the patents that were issued as far back as 1872, and some of which carry General Grant's signature to them. Gentlemen, it is absurd.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to show to the gentlemen of the House, so that they may get my amendment, and I will have it read for information.

The SPEAKER. Is time yielded to the gentleman to have his amendment read?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; I am anxious to hear it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, however, That this resolution shall not relate to any lands for which patents have been issued, which are now held by bona fide purchasers, other than railroad corporations or corporations or persons holding title for any such railroad corporations as trustees to secure any bonded or other indebtedness, or for any purpose whatsoever.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan whether the Department of Justice has approved this amendment?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not think the Department of Justice has ever seen it; no, sir.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Has the gentleman made any effort to submit it to the Department of Justice?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; I hardly had time to prepare it when I heard that the bill was coming up to-day.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Has the Public Lands Committee approved it?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not think they approve of any amendment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. They do not approve of any amendment, and this morning they voted 15 to 1 to instruct the chairman of the committee to insist on the passage of the Senate resolution 48 without amendment. The Department of Justice—General Bonaparte—and its special counsel, Mr. Townsend, have been before that great committee and insisted upon this resolution being passed exactly as it was sent here by the Senate of the United States last February, and it has been under consideration by that committee down until this morning at 11.30 o'clock, when we were called here to vote on another public-land bill. As I say, this morning, by a vote of 15 to 1, the chairman of the committee was directed to insist upon the Senate resolution and that alone.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee will suspend. The Chair will state that it is not in order to refer in the House to what passed in the committee.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understand that, but there has been so much about public-land frauds, Mr. Speaker, that has been locked up for so long, that this is one of the cases where everything ought to be known.

The SPEAKER. Two wrongs or two infractions of the rules do not make a right.

Mr. MONDELL. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the committee has offered no amendment; that the committee is opposed to all amendments. The gentleman from Tennessee knows that it is impossible to get on the floor for consideration of these matters unless we give an opportunity to the House to consider an amendment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am informed here and elsewhere concerning this matter that the Speaker absolutely refused recognition to bring up Senate resolution 48 without this amendment.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is what I am informed by members of the Public Lands Committee, who have the matter in charge, and I say it without reflecting at all upon the Speaker. The Speaker has the right to do it.

The SPEAKER. If the House will indulge the Speaker—and this is not to be taken out of the time of the gentleman from Tennessee—the Speaker desires to say that this is a motion to suspend the rules, and the Speaker did, in the performance of his duty as a Member of the House and as Speaker, propose that the motion to suspend the rules should give the House a chance to vote upon the amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Here is an amendment to amend a resolution that meets with the hearty approval of the Department of Justice, based upon the recommendation of the President of the United States, a resolution, if you please, that has passed the United States Senate, a resolution that has been pending before, and thoroughly considered for four or five weeks by, and which meets with the hearty approval of, the Public Lands Committee of the House, and yet here is a green amendment brought in here at this late hour. The amendment of the gentleman from Michigan is not submitted to the committee, nor to the Department of Justice, nor to the Senate of the United States.

Yet, with this great question, involving $50,000,000 in public lands, with the President and the Department of Justice on one side, together with the Senate and the Public Lands Committees of the Senate and House, demanding that justice be done and that the Department of Justice be not clogged by any such amendment as that, we find that the Speaker will not let this great question come up unless that amendment be considered, which meets with the approval of a lot, they say, of innocent purchasers—"innocent purchasers!"—that will not submit their claims to the arbitrament of the great Supreme Court of the United States!! How can they so feel, if they are innocent? And what does this elaborate and able House report mean, which says "that none of the large sales are to actual settlers," but to lumber people and lumber kings and people of millions and "speculators." Harriman is against all this proposition, and he has withdrawn a great portion of the Oregon land from any settlement at all and is paralyzing that State. He will not in recent years let anybody buy this land. He has been disobeying the law, and so has his great railroad, for years and years and years. Yet, Mr. Speaker, here we find an amendment that comes in here undigested, and that does not meet with the approval of but a few at most, which may tie the hands of the Supreme Court of the United States and embarrass the Department of Justice in its great work.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on suspending the rules and agreeing to the motion to adopt the order.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, pending that motion, I move that the House do now take a recess until 11.30 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. SPEAKER. Pending that, the question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York, that the House do take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11.30 o'clock.

The question was taken.

The SPEAKER. The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 123, nays 83, answered "present" 13, not voting 168, as follows:

Accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 46 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until to-morrow at 11.30 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of Samuel A. Sheldon, administrator of estate of Henry Bennett, against The United States (H. R. Doc. 875)—to the Committee on War Claims and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination of Choctawhatchee River, Florida and Alabama (H. R. Doc. 876)—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2, of Rule XIII, bills were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 18513) to repeal section 5 of an act entitled "An act relating to the sale of gas in the District of Columbia," approved June 6, 1896, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1499), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. SPARKMAN, from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, to which was referred the bill of the Senate, S. 4171, reported in lieu thereof a bill of the House (H. R. 21173) to provide for continuation of investigations of the water resources of the United States, accompanied by a report (No. 1500), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. CHAPMAN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 21127) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1494), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. FULLER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 5938) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war, and certain widows and helpless and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1495), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. CALDERHEAD, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 6192) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war, and to certain widows and helpless and dependent children of such soldiers and sailors, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 1496), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 19746) to ratify a certain lease with the Seneca Nation of Indians, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1497), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. LANING, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 21135) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and to certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the civil war, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1498), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

SENATE.

THURSDAY, April 23, 1908.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD E. HALE.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. TELLER, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 15641. An act for the removal of restrictions from part of the lands of allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 17827. An act to provide for the disposal of lands chiefly valuable for oil and asphaltum.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 5262) to repeal an act approved April 30, 1906, entitled "An act to regulate shipping in trade between ports of the United States and ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago, between ports or places in the Philippine Archipelago, and for other purposes," and for other purposes.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition of sundry citizens of Holyoke, Mass., praying for the adoption of certain amendments to the so-called "Sherman antitrust law" relating to labor organizations, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of Local Union No. 105, International Brotherhood of Stationary Firemen, of Glens Falls, N. Y.; of Local Union, International Brotherhood of Stationary Firemen, of Berlin, N. H.; of Local Union No. 252, International Brotherhood of Stationary Firemen, of Wilder, and of Local Union No. 5, International Brotherhood of Paper Makers, Pulp, Sulphite, and Paper Mill Workers, of Bellows Falls, in the State of Vermont, remonstrating against the repeal of the duty on white paper, wood pulp, and the materials used in the manufacture thereof, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PLATT presented the memorial of Edward J. O'Connor, of Buffalo, N. Y., and a memorial of the Emmet Club, of Tarrytown, N. Y., remonstrating against the ratification of the arbitration treaty between the United States and Great Britain, which were ordered to lie on the table.

THE UNITED STATES NAVY.

Mr. TELLER. As the naval appropriation bill is to be before the Senate to-day, I have here a communication in proper form that I should like to have inserted in the RECORD without reading. It is from Mr. Willard S. Isham, of Washington, D. C., and relates to the building of more battle ships.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado asks that there may be printed in the RECORD, without reading, a paper on the subject of more battle ships for the Navy. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The paper is as follows:

We are again confronted with the proposition of building more battle ships predicated upon two questionable assumptions, either of which being incorrect render such ships practically worthless.

The first assumption is that the primary batteries of such ships can penetrate the thick armor protecting the vitals and personnel of an adversary of the same class at the battle range imposed by the destructive limit of the torpedo. Were this effect impossible, in fact, battle ships would evidently become merely armored torpedo vessels, and, consequently, should be given greater speed and torpedo equipment in place of the big guns and turrets in order that the capacity for destructive blows might be as great as possible. In other words, if this effect is impossible, guns would bear the same relation to the torpedo that a dog's bark does to his bite, and therefore we should propagate a breed of ships with less bark and more bite.

Concerning the possibility of such armor penetration at battle ranges, your attention is respectfully directed to the reports of the intelligence bureaus of different countries upon the effect of gun fire in the Russo-Japanese war, and to testimony recently taken before the committees of Congress, which show that thick armor has never been penetrated either in war or on the proving grounds at the minimum battle range of 5,000 yards fixed by the 21-inch torpedo now used, although hundreds of hits have been scored on such armor, but that when battle ships were sunk by gun fire in the war referred to it was because they were loaded down until the thick armor was submerged and it was necessary simply to penetrate the thinner armor.

If this testimony is to be accepted as to past results it must be admitted that thick armor plate never will be penetrated in future wars, because the gun is already overstrained by pressures that make it useless after about sixty shots, while the possibilities of increasing the range with the torpedo are practically unlimited. If this testimony is not accepted as conclusive it is certainly of sufficient weight to demand that a test should be carried out to prove the point before another cent is expended upon battle ships based upon such an assumption. No business man would pay for a machine while there was a doubt as to its efficiency but would first test the feature in controversy. Should Congress compel the taxpayers of this country to do what they would not do if permitted to exercise their own judgments?

The second assumption is that outside high-explosive shell will not destroy a battle ship. This assumption is known to be incorrect by all authorities, yet it is kept a secret from Congress, which ought to know the facts and take them into consideration, if the Treasury of this country or the efficiency of our defenses are to be factors in deciding upon defensive constructions and implements. Tests have already been made showing that such shells will destroy a battle ship if exploded in the water even at a distance from such vessels, and in case of the most powerful of these this distance is nearly 50 feet, or, in other words, there is an encircling zone about a battle ship of an area equal to that occupied by the ship itself within which such shells may explode and destroy the ship as proven by tests. Hence a 25-knot vessel of the Invincible type employing such shell, with which England is experimenting, could select and maintain such a point of attack with reference to a fleet of our battle ships, employing armor-piercing shell, that her thinner armor would be impenetrable to their projectiles while her own shell would be destructive and decide the combat in her favor. A comparison would be a mounted rifleman opposed in an open country by a band of men on foot armed with shotguns. There is no need to indicate the strategy or tactics that would be employed in the combat or to argue as to the result. If outside explosive shell will destroy battle ships if exploding in the water near them, as the record shows, every dollar expended upon such ships on present lines is evidently so much money wasted.

Outside high-explosive shell, however, are not limited in their employment to the subaqueous effects cited, but are believed to be equally as efficient if striking a ship anywhere and under any condition of impact or even after striking water and bounding. Tests have been made against plates, but this question should be definitely settled by tests made against such armor in position on a ship. The Navy Department is about to carry out tests against the Florida with shells of about one-sixth the strength of those which might be employed, the object being to decide as to the immunity of sights and other appliances to the explosive shock of such shell. Of what use is such a test when an enemy may employ the stronger shell and why should money be wasted upon such a test or upon installations based upon the results? The most powerful shell ever fired from a service gun should be employed and its effect upon the turret, belt armor, and personnel, represented by domestic animals, should be noted. A request was made that such a test be carried out with the Isham shell, but this was met by the statement that the shell was dangerous and that a bond must be furnished to cover any possible loss through accident.

This shell has been experimented with in this country for ten years, and the only time an accident has occurred with it was when certain incidents entered into the test that fully doubled the severity of the conditions as stipulated which caused the Army Chief of Ordnance to report that the results "did not affect the merits of the invention" and the Secretary of War to order two more tests to be made. The Isham shell has always been fired with perfect safety with the gun pressure employed with armor-piercing shell, and as it is proposed to use ordinarily very much less pressure with it in order to prolong the life of the gun, since the effect of the shells is the same, and, furthermore, as in the proposed test it was suggested to use even a very much lesser pressure, it is submitted that this request for a bond savors of an attempt to prevent a test and is not made to protect the country against loss, but to protect the Department against discredit if the tests were carried out and were successful, because in such case, as Captain Simms, Naval Aid to the President, stated before your committee, "the jig would be up with the navies of the world, including our own," and the Department would be asked by an interested public why this matter had not been determined ten years ago when it first came up and the country saved the hundreds of millions of dollars wasted in ships constructed on unsubstantiated hypotheses.

Fair play would seem to demand that if this bond is further urged that the officers requesting it should be asked to furnish a bond to protect the country against loss through the ships becoming useless by the substantiation of these claims at a later date when the officers who now urge these tests, but are opposed by the Departments, come into power and direct in such matters.

These tests as delineated should be made; no subterfuges should be permitted to prevent them, as it is not at this time and will not be in the future an edifying sight to witness an investigation made to ascertain why ideas have not been tested as presented and the country saved the appropriations made to correct the resulting mistakes. Moreover, in this instance failure to carry out these tests might imperil the very existence of the nation. I should be pleased to appear before your committee and present witnesses and evidence in favor of these contentions, and trust that in case you do not consider it necessary to do so that you will order the tests to be made as requested or that the whole matter will be subjected to a searching investigation as called for by a resolution introduced by Senator DILLINGHAM and which was referred to your committee at the request of your chairman. I am,

Very respectfully,

WILLARD S. ISHAM.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 20, 1908.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 155) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan certain tents for use at the national convention of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks to be held at Dallas, Tex., in July, 1908, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 559) thereon.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6487) to govern seagoing barges, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 560) thereon.

Mr. DEPEW, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6417) to amend sections 4467 and 4468 of the Revised Statutes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 561) thereon.

MICHIGAN CITY HARBOR IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 79) authorizing the widening of the channel of Michigan City Harbor, to report it favorably without amendment, and I submit a report (No. 558) thereon. I call this to the attention of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE].

Mr. BEVERIDGE. As the joint resolution will have no opposition, I am sure, I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It authorizes the Secretary of War to use any unexpended balance of money heretofore appropriated or that may be hereafter appropriated for the improvement or maintenance of the harbor at Michigan City, Ind., for the rebuilding of the western revetment of said harbor upon a new alignment, with the view of widening the channel of said harbor.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. OWEN introduced a bill (S. 6795) for the refunding of certain moneys, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. RAYNER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 6796) to refund certain duties inequitably collected on anthracite coal by the collector of customs at Baltimore, Md., which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 6797) for the relief of persons who have conveyed lands to the United States under certain conditions, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6798) granting an increase of pension to Charles H. Millis, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BACON (by request) introduced a bill (S. 6799) for the relief of John W. Boston, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 6800) authorizing the President of the United States to confer rank upon Major Joseph W. Wham, United States Army, retired, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CULBERSON (by request) introduced a bill (S. 6801) for the relief of Sarah E. Dixon, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CARTER introduced a bill (S. 6802) to amend section 3834 of the Revised Statutes by striking therefrom the requirement for an additional condition, relating to the money-order business, in the bond of a postmaster at a money-order office, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. FLINT introduced a bill (S. 6803) for the relief of Ella Phillips, widow of David Phillips, deceased, which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CARTER introduced a bill (S. 6804) granting an increase of pension to George H. Ricker, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HEYBURN introduced a bill (S. 6805) to encourage the development of coal deposits in the Territory of Alaska, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PAYNTER introduced a bill (S. 6806) to correct the military record of William N. Air, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6807) granting a pension to Arch. C. Vickers, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6808) for the relief of the heirs or estate of Henry Cohen, deceased, which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. STEPHENSON (for Mr. LA FOLLETTE) introduced a bill (S. 6809) relating to trial by jury in Federal courts and limiting the power of the presiding judge to express an opinion to the jury on the facts of the case and the stenographic record thereof, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also (for Mr. LA FOLLETTE) introduced a bill (S. 6810) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. STONE introduced a bill (S. 6811) granting an increase of pension to Stephen Corwin, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM submitted an amendment providing for the survey of land in township 9 north, etc., in the State of Colorado, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOPKINS submitted an amendment directing the Postmaster-General to contract for a term not exceeding four years from July 1, 1908, by underground electric-car service in the city of Chicago, Ill., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Post-Office appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and ordered to be printed.

Mr. OVERMAN submitted an amendment, proposing to appropriate $50,000 for the construction of a public building at Salisbury, N. C., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $42,532 to pay to the State of North Carolina for cotton taken from the authorities of that State immediately after the close of the civil war, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LONG submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to pay to H. C. Linn and Samuel Powell a certain amount of the appropriation provided for by the act of Congress of June 30, 1906, providing for the payment of the judgment rendered by the Court of Claims in consolidated causes Nos. 23195, 23214, 23212, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. BANKHEAD was, on his own motion, and by unanimous consent, relieved from further service upon the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. JOHNSTON was, upon his own motion, and by unanimous consent, relieved from further service upon the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CULBERSON, on behalf of Mr. STONE, asked that that Senator be relieved from further service on the Committee on the Philippines, and, by unanimous consent, the request was complied with.

Mr. CULBERSON submitted the following resolutions, which were considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That Mr. BANKHEAD be appointed to fill the vacancy in the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Resolved, That Mr. JOHNSTON be appointed to fill the vacancy in the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Resolved, That Mr. PAYNTER be appointed to fill the vacancy in the Committee on the Philippines.

Resolved, That Mr. STONE be appointed to fill the vacancy in the Committee on Foreign Relations.

HOT SPRINGS RESERVATION, ARK.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 15852) to confer title in fee and to authorize the disposition of certain lots now situate on Hot Springs Reservation, in the State of Arkansas, and for other purposes. It is a local matter.

The Secretary read the bill, and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. HALE. I gave notice that I would desire to take up the naval appropriation bill this morning. The appropriation bills are in such a condition that they must be pushed. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] has given way, and I can not consent to take up bills, if any, that will give rise to any discussion.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. This will not, I think.

Mr. HALE. After this bill is disposed of, I shall ask for the regular order.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 15641. An act for the removal of restrictions from part of the lands of allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

H. R. 17827. An act to provide for the disposal of lands chiefly valuable for oil and asphaltum was read twice by its title.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, in the absence of objection.

Mr. HEYBURN. It should go to the Committee on Mines and Mining. The Senator from California [Mr. FLINT] has a bill on the same subject now pending before a subcommittee of that committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the naval appropriation bill be laid before the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 20471) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Missouri expected to go on with his remarks this morning, but finds himself in a condition where it will be preferable, in his judgment, not to speak to-day. He has indicated to me that he will not resume his remarks until Monday. Therefore I propose to go on with the naval appropriation bill. But the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] tells me that he is so situated, as it is very important that he may get away, that he would like to submit some remarks to the Senate now, and I yield to him for the present.

Mr. FORAKER. Before the Senator from Maryland proceeds, if I understand the announcement, it is that the Senator from Missouri does not care to go on this morning, as was contemplated, but he will go on to-morrow.

Mr. WARNER. No, on Monday, for reasons which I explained to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FORAKER. I understand. That is perfectly satisfactory.

RESERVED RIGHTS OF STATES.

Mr. RAYNER. I call up Senate resolution No. 149, and ask that it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays the resolution before the Senate. It will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. RAYNER on the 13th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate the powers delegated by the Constitution to the United States must not be enlarged by implication or so construed as to conflict with or encroach upon the reserved rights of the States as guaranteed by the tenth amendment.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, it has been a custom more honored in the breach than in the observance during the sessions of Congress preceding a Presidential election for Members of both Houses to submit their views upon public questions to be circulated as campaign literature during the pendency of the contest. I hope that what I propose to say will not be used for that purpose, because I do not believe in the propriety of the practice and because I have no such object in view in presenting the proposition that I shall now briefly advert to. The motive that influences me at the present moment is simply, if I can, to clear away a misapprehension that has taken hold of the public mind in reference to the doctrine of States rights that since I have been a member of this body has been advocated by a number of us in discussions upon this floor, and around which there adheres among a large class of people a degree of confusion and misunderstanding which in justice to those of us who still take great pride in being denominated States-rights Democrats should be removed, because we are being constantly charged with being what we are not, and with favoring governmental policies that no longer play a practical part in the settlement of the great questions that are pending before the country.

I will, therefore, now define what I mean by States-rights Democracy. I mean this, nothing less and nothing more: I mean that the rights of the States must be maintained inviolate as intended by the framers of the Constitution; that there must be no perversion of the delegated powers so as to strike down the reservation to the States, and that whatever rights the States possess under the Constitution and under the amendments must remain intact and unimpaired until, if ever, the Constitution should be changed by the voice of the people according to the methods that it provides, and the structure of our Government should be diverted from its present conception and design.

We fully realize that we can not stand upon a construction of the Constitution that has been forever settled by contending arms and the adjudication of civil war; we further realize that until the day when, perhaps, some of the decisions may be reversed, we are bound by the judgment of the Supreme Court in interpreting the Constitution, and we also know that the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, unlawfully adopted it is true, have, nevertheless, become an integral part of our organic law until, perhaps, at some time they may be repealed or modified in a lawful way by a law-abiding people. If I may be allowed, therefore, to say so, the modern doctrine of States rights is an old principle, but with a new purpose and a new application. The doctrine has almost slumbered for nearly half a century, because there were no great forces at work to revive it and the spirit of its principal advocates had been silenced and subdued, and it was not until the advent of the present Administration that the lines have been clearly and unmistakably drawn between the purpose on the one hand to centralize and concentrate Federal power and Executive prerogative, and the purpose of those who still remain true to the traditions of their faith to rescue, if possible, the States from the impending dangers that confront them.

A CRISIS OF CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY.

We are passing through a great crisis of constitutional history. We are doing this unconsciously, to a large extent, but positively and permanently. Nearly all important changes in the form of governments take place in this way, unnoticeable at first, and then when the consummation comes the people wonder how it was accomplished, forgetful of the fact that it is merely the result of the logic of events gradually working its way to its final realization. Some day when the people suddenly discover that the reserved rights of the States have been reduced to a minimum and that the States have been shorn of their sovereign functions and the whole structure of the Constitution has been changed they will be startled and they will want to know how it came about and they will want to learn the process by which it can be all undone. It will then be found that it is too late, that the chain is riveted, and that each succeeding link was forged while they were sleeping on their rights. The way to arrest a radical attack upon our institutions is not to wait until the edifice is crumbling, but to guard its approaches and to protect them at every point from the invader's touch. The Supreme Court of the United States is not the forum within which to make the contest for constitutional rights. The Supreme Court is vested with a tremendous responsibility. There is no appeal from its decrees. It may make the greatest possible mistakes, and there is no way of rectifying them, except by a voluntary reversal of its own decisions. The people are powerless, because the judges are above the people, and there is, therefore, no remedy when the edict is once announced. There is no judicial tribunal on earth possessing the unlimited power that is vested in the Supreme Court of the United States.

Taking it as a whole, not in fragments, but as a unit, I regard it in times gone by, and even at the present hour, as the bulwark of the Constitution. The power to set aside an act of Congress by declaring its legislation unconstitutional is one that was never intended to be reposed in this tribunal by the framers of the instrument. It is a strange historic reminiscence to refer to that a motion to confer such a jurisdiction was twice voted down in the constitutional convention, but, nevertheless, it is a power that the Supreme Court has constantly exercised and upon many an occasion in the interest of constitutional guaranties of personal freedom and of individual rights. One thing, however, I contend for, and that is that if there is to be any contest for constitutional rights we should not enact legislation here of doubtful validity to be remitted to the Supreme Court for its determination, but here upon the floor of Congress is the place to make the contest, and while we are making it have it fully understood, so that there can be no mistake about what the contest means.

THE STORM CENTER OF THE CONFLICT.

The storm center around which constitutional discussion is now being waged is the clause that gives Congress the right to regulate commerce between the States. Those of us who can not acquiesce in the novel and original conception of governmental power that is claimed to come within this provision are immediately informed that the Constitution grows and expands with the progress and development of the country, and that when the benighted authors of that document placed the commercial clause among its principal provisions they failed to comprehend that commerce would eventually comprise almost everything contained in the vocabulary, and that the right to regulate it would mean the right to destroy it, the right to own the instrumentalities that convey it, to supervise the labor that is engaged in its manufacture, to take jurisdiction over every place where it is produced and handled, and the arbitrary right without restraint or limit to control and circumscribe it from the time that it makes its appearance as the raw material of the earth until the finished product is landed in the place of its ultimate destination.

I propose now under this clause to give some striking illustrations for the purpose of showing not only what the doctrine of States rights means at the present moment, but in order to demonstrate how far the perversion and misinterpretation of the Constitution has proceeded in the direction of minimizing the functions of the State, and expanding beyond the intention and spirit of the instrument the delegated powers of the General Government.

WHAT IS COMMERCE?

One of the most extreme instances that I can give of the tendency to distort the delegated powers of the Constitution is exemplified in the child-labor bill which was framed by the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] and was discussed by him in a most interesting and instructive discourse delivered at the last session of the Senate, and which is now under consideration by the Committee on Education and Labor. I entirely agree with the Senator from Indiana in the great moral principle that underlies this bill, and I only wish that I could find constitutional sanction for its passage. At the proper time I shall submit to the Senate a line of authorities, which, in my judgment, withdraws the enactment of such a measure from the provisions of any of the delegated powers of the Constitution. The Senator from Indiana, with a spirit of zealous devotion that always distinguishes him in his advocacy of any cause that enlists the powers of his intellect or the sympathies of his heart, discussed this bill in an address which I have referred to, and which takes rank, in my judgment, with some of the ablest efforts that we have ever heard in this Chamber, but his argument, analytical and comprehensive as it was, illustrates in a marked degree the existence of the constructive and destructive principle that I am discussing, and which is now at work groping its way toward the citadel of our institutions, and which will gradually undermine it unless in the arena of debate we can challenge it to battle and compel it to retreat.

I read the first section of the bill:

Be it enacted, etc., That six months from and after the passage of this act no carrier of interstate commerce shall transport or accept for transportation the products of any factory or mine in which children under 14 years of age are employed or permitted to work, which products are offered to said interstate carrier by the firm, person, or corporation owning or operating said factory or mine, or any officer or agent or servant thereof, for transportation into any other State or Territory than the one in which said factory is located.

Is it not patent upon its face that this is a bill not to regulate commerce, but to regulate the labor that produces the commerce? Is there any warrant in the Constitution for the exercise of such a power? In order to accomplish its purpose we would have to amend the commerce clause of the Constitution so that it shall read:

That Congress shall have the power to regulate commerce among the States and also the labor that is engaged in its production or manufacture.

Here is the case of the dormant power referred to by the Secretary of State in the celebrated discourse that he delivered some time ago. The States have failed to exercise it for their mutual and general welfare. Now make your insertion manu forti and interpolate it among the delegated powers of the General Government.

The Senator from Indiana, in his views upon this question, has stepped in front of his party lines so radically that even the President, after following him in his message last year, has, by subsequent messages, sounded a slow retreat from the advanced limits of centralization which the Senator from Indiana has reached in the measure that I am now discussing. I will not call these doctrines of the Senator from Indiana Republicanism, but I will distinguish him as the new apostle of the new creed of nationalism and Federalism which has sprung up in our midst. He asserts and defends the doctrine that if there is a manufactory in the United States that employs a single child in its establishment, then, under the supervision of Federal inspectors and supervisors and secret-service agents, its business can be destroyed and its whole output of adult labor can be excluded from the channels of interstate commerce. It is so pertinent in this connection, and it is so brief, that I want to read an extract from the opinion of Mr. Justice Lamar, when he was treating a subject that was kindred to the one that I am now discussing.

Says Justice Lamar, in Kidd v. Pearson, in 128 United States:

No distinction is more popular to the common mind, or more clearly expressed in economic and political literature, than that between manufacture and commerce. Manufacture is transformation—the fashioning of raw materials into a change of form and use. The functions of commerce are different. The buying and selling and the transportation incidental thereto constitute commerce, and the regulation of commerce in the constitutional sense embraces the regulation at least of such transportation. If it be held that the term includes the regulation of all such manufactures as are intended to be the subject of commercial transactions in the future, it is impossible to deny that it would also include all productive industries that contemplate the same thing. The result would be that Congress would be vested, to the exclusion of the States, with the power to regulate, not only manufactures, but also agriculture, horticulture, stock raising, domestic fisheries, mining—in short, every branch of human industry. For is there one of them that does not contemplate, more or less clearly, an interstate or foreign market? Does not the wheat grower of the Northwest or the cotton planter of the South plant, cultivate, and harvest his crop with an eye on the prices at Liverpool, New York, and Chicago? The power being vested in Congress and denied to the States, it would follow as an inevitable result that the duty would devolve on Congress to regulate all of these delicate, multiform, and vital interests—interests which in their nature are and must be local in all the details of their successful management.

STARTLING PROPOSITIONS.

Advancing a step beyond the principle embraced in this bill, we have another doctrine, and, I regret to say, sustained by high Democratic authority, that Congress ought to pass a law providing that corporations should be limited in the amount of the product that they can consign into other States and that Congress has the right to place an arbitrary figure upon their business transactions when they enter into the channels of interstate commerce. The Constitution makes no classification of corporations or any distinction between them and individuals, and if we have a right to do this with corporations, we have precisely the same right to do it with individuals. We have a bill now before the Senate that substantially embodies this principle. It is a monstrous proposition and one that would finally place every commercial transaction and every business enterprise under Federal supervision. If such a bill should pass, I have no doubt that the Supreme Court would declare it unconstitutional, and as I understand that an attempt will be made to incorporate this provision in the Democratic platform, the people should be made to understand as soon as possible that their representatives in this body, at least, have still a glimmering recollection of what the Constitution means and that the Democratic party has still a bodyguard of faithful watchers, who will see to it that the party is not thus dismembered in her coming platform while there is yet a spark of life within her veins.

This brings me to another proposition that is more startling than those I have just referred to. Congress is given the right by the Constitution to establish post-offices and post-roads. The President deduces from this grant the power to control the intrastate railways of the United States that do not pass beyond the boundaries of the State that created them.

This is his language:

To-day I wish to say a word to you about the first and most important feature of this task—the control of the common carriers doing an interstate business, a control absolutely vested in the nation, while in so far as the common carriers also transport the mails, it is, in my opinion, probable that whether their business is or is not interstate, it is to the same extent subject to Federal control under that clause of the Constitution granting to the National Government power to establish post-roads, and therefore, by necessary implication, power to take all action necessary in order to keep them at the highest point of efficiency.

I quote it literally, that the business of common carriers, whether interstate or not, is subject to Federal control. This suggestion of the President proceeds beyond anything in the line of Federal centralization that has ever been advocated since the Constitution was adopted. If this construction is correct, it places the Government of the United States right within the boundaries of the State and gives it complete jurisdiction over every internal highway in the country. Every highway either is or can be made a post-road, and, being a post-road, it can be controlled, not only for post-road purposes, as contemplated by the terms of the Constitution, but for all purposes of commerce and traffic that pass over its bed. As the governmental authority prevails whenever it exists under the delegated powers of the Constitution, according to this process of constitutional interpretation the highways of every State in the Union ex rei necessitate pass into the control and jurisdiction of the Federal Government, without any reference whatever to the commerce clause of the Constitution at all. No judge, no jurist, no court, no text writer, no expounder or commentator whom I have ever heard of ever conceived of such an interpretation as this, and the President alone is entitled to all the credit and all the glory that attaches to this unheralded discovery. His great intellect perceived in this perfectly innocent grant of the right to establish a post-road for the purpose of carrying the mail, and of a post-office for the purpose of receiving and distributing it, an opportunity to swoop down upon the States and upon their municipalities and deprive them of their right of eminent domain, which is absolutely essential for their local sovereignty and existence.

COROLLARIES.

As a corollary from this constitutional demonstration we have the President recommending in the same address the national incorporation of railroads, and we have heard this scheme earnestly and intelligently advocated upon this floor. I will admit that if we were just assembled in convention and framing a constitution for the United States, that it might possibly be an open question whether interstate-commerce carriers should obtain their franchises from the States or from the National Government. As it is now, these charters, with a few exceptions, have been granted by the State governments. One State grants the charter and other States grant the right of way over their respective territories. What do we propose to do about it? This is one of the questions of the future that this new Nationalist, or Socialist, party, or by whatever name it may be called, that is now looming up on the horizon proposes to agitate. There is only one way of accomplishing the object, and that is to pass a law that all common carriers shall be prohibited from carrying interstate commerce unless they submit to Federal incorporation. It must be observed that there is nothing in the Constitution that prohibits in express terms the Federal Government from violating the obligation of contracts. The language of section 10 is:

That no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts.

The principle involved in the Dartmouth College case may therefore, of itself, be no obstacle to the exercise of Federal power, though the Government can not take property without due process of law.

The point, therefore, that I make is that all the charters, with but few exceptions, will be forfeited under such a law, and that every franchise granted to every common carrier by every State in the Union would be practically vacated, and I predict it here now that this is a proposition that we must soon encounter and battle with.

The senior Senator from Indiana says that commerce can be absolutely prohibited between the States, relying upon certain adjudications of the Supreme Court, which I do not believe sustain him, and there are bills from our side that are now before us embodying the same principle, that the right to regulate includes not only as to foreign nations, but as between the States, the right of absolute prohibition.

In other words, let me state the case so that it can be plainly understood. The proposition is that whenever the commercial clause of the Constitution comes in contact with the reserved rights of the States protected by the tenth amendment, the reserved rights of the States must yield, not by reason of a construction which gives the commercial clause of the Constitution the preference and the right of way, but by a penalty of prohibition which, by implication, shall be annexed to the power to regulate and by virtue of which an embargo can be laid upon the products of any State unless those who are in possession of its chartered rights and franchises submit to Federal jurisdiction.

It is well to grasp this situation at the threshold, because it is all around us. It is permeating this Senate Chamber and the House of Representatives, and under this particular phase of it that I am now discussing it simply means that, if one State in the Union grants a charter to a railroad and other States through which it passes grant it the right of way over their territory, both the original and ancillary jurisdiction of the States to create and organize the corporation and enable it to perform its functions must, under the penalty of prohibition, surrender to Federal jurisdiction, and the common carriers must abdicate all the rights and franchises granted to them by the States of their creation and their domicile.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE UPON THE SCENE.

Having reached this stage of constitutional construction, we come to a proposition now that overtops the whole of them, and by one fell stroke, if it can be successfully maintained, obliterates the framework of our Government.

We have a proposition boldly announced by our Secretary of State, a lawyer of profound intellect and of preeminent ability, that, if the States do not come to the rescue of the Federal Government whenever an emergency arises for the exercise of Federal power, ways will be found which will give the Federal Government the right to exercise the power that it proposes, whether it comes within its delegated functions or not. I said at the last session of Congress in an address before this body upon Executive usurpation, and I repeat it now, that this is the most startling and dangerous doctrine ever announced before the American people. The States have certain dormant powers. Those powers, says the Secretary, when Federal emergency requires it, must be brought into exercise and activity; if they are allowed to remain passive, and if a State does not conduct its legislation with regard to the welfare of all the other States, judicial constructions will be found that will override the reserved rights of the States and transfer their dormant and unexercised power into the hands of the General Government. I have been waiting for a year, with resignation and with patience, for the Secretary to recall this revolutionary utterance or in some way to temper or to moderate it, but there it still stands as it did upon the day on which it was first uttered, as a letter of marque and reprisal to justify every pirate in his attempt to depredate upon the ship of state. We had better tear the Constitution into shreds and start anew than have such a manifesto as this, emanating from the heights, thundered down to Congress and to the Federal circuits of the United States.

It says to Congress: "Pass your unconstitutional laws, and we will see to it that the courts will make them valid by interpolating them into the Constitution."

It is forever an end to the sovereignty of the States within their own jurisdiction, it puts the torch to the framework of the Constitution, and, what is worse than all combined, coming from such a distinguished source, it inculcates into the minds of the rising generation a precept which, if put into practice by those to whom it is addressed, will eventually and inevitably bring dishonor upon the institutions of the country. Fortified by such an authority as this, is there any wonder that the President proposed through the treaty-making power to overthrow the local institutions of every Commonwealth of the land with which it came in conflict? The States levy a tax for the support of their local governments, and without asking any help or advice from the Federal Government in this regard, they legislate with reference to the usages and the customs and the needs and requirements of their people.

"But," says the President, "you do all this subject to my right to barter your rights away. You have the right, but I have the power, with the consent of the Senate, to make the treaty, and when the two rights conflict, mine prevails and the States must surrender."

I want to say to the Senate now that in my opinion if it had not been for concessions that the State of California made, or for concessions that the foreign government made, either one or the other—I know not which—when this controversy was at its height, we would have had a conflict over this question, led by the President and his Secretary, the result of which and its disastrous consequences it would have been found impossible to foresee.

ARE WE AN INDESTRUCTIBLE UNION OF INDESTRUCTIBLE STATES?

These are all new propositions that have been born over night, and this is what we are coming to; and speaking now beyond these halls to the rising generation, I appeal to them again and again, as I have often done before, not to ignore these insidious attacks upon the institutions of our country. Are we, as proclaimed by the Supreme Court of the United States, an indestructible Union of indestructible States, or is this a Government of inherent power? If so, where is the power that lies in sovereignty and not in grant? We States-rights Democrats have no purpose whatever to nullify any of the powers of the General Government. As I have said before, States rights now are something entirely different from what they were in the days that are past. The old doctrine is buried in the graves of those who sacrificed their fortunes and their lives in its defense, and this new doctrine that I am now discussing was ushered into life with the advent of the present Administration, and the emergencies that have called forth Federal activities absolutely compel us now to inquire what is the limit to their exercise. Is the emergency to control them or are they governed by law? I am a representative of one of the original States, and I stand by the terms of the covenant, not by the letter, but by the logic and the spirit of the charter. I say, put into execution every delegated power when the necessity arises for its exercise, but not if I can prevent it shall the instrument be perverted and new powers that do not belong there incorporated into its provisions. We want the Constitution to stand as it is; and if it is to be amended, to have the change made in accordance with the methods that it provides. I will not say that the Republican party in its entirety stands for any different process, because there are many members of that party who agree with us upon this subject; but I do unhesitatingly say that a new school of revisionists has arisen in the land, who are undermining the fabric and shaking the pillars of the temple. They want the covenant broken. Call them what you will, Federalists or Nationalists, they are the apostles of destruction. They are gathering their disciples principally from the ranks of those who do not understand the philosophy of our institutions.

Every act of Executive usurpation meets with their approval, and every attempt to curtail the liberty of the States has their sanction and indorsement.

I am here to oppose to the last degree this new doctrine of Federal centralization. We are fully capable in the States of managing our own affairs in accordance with our traditions and our usages and our customs. We do not want the jurisdiction of the Federal courts enlarged unless demanded by the necessities of the case, nor our State courts interfered with in the administration of justice. We do not want any unnecessary embargo laid upon our legitimate commerce nor our State charters subjected to Federal forfeiture. We protest in unmeasured terms against the presence of Federal inspectors and deputy marshals and supervisors in the business establishments of our States. We deny the right of the General Government to dictate the kind of labor that we shall employ in our manufacturing establishments. We stand upon our rights under the tenth amendment to the Constitution. This tenth amendment has added nothing whatever to the rights of the States, as they existed before its adoption. The rights of the States, outside of the delegated powers, would have existed with equal force if this amendment had never been framed. Its only purpose was out of extreme caution to emphasize the proposition that they should not be intruded upon.

MY DEMOCRACY.

I have stated now what is my Democracy. I do not believe that our party can be born again. It is either a States-rights party under the present acceptation of that term, or it is nothing. It will never come into power as an annex of the Republican party. If it changes its historic principles, it must change its historic name. It can not accept the new revelation and cling to its ancient title. The moment it parts with its heirloom and is birthright it disintegrates.

The Democratic party to-day is in favor of the exercise of Federal power wherever it exists and whenever it is necessary to bring it into operation. Whenever the emergency of the Union demands it, we shall answer with loyal hearts the summons of the Constitution and maintain and defend it. Whenever the welfare of all the States demands the exercise of the delegated powers, we resolutely believe in bringing them into play. We do not, and we shall not, and we can not, believe in perverting the delegated powers of the Federal Government. We deny as a party the right of Congress, or the Executive, or the courts, to misconstrue them and enlarge them beyond the intent and spirit of the instrument. However much it may regale the body politic, and whatever new vitality it may infuse into its organs, we reject the application and shall not put the chalice to our lips. If this is not Democracy, then I know not what I am. I am here in strict obedience to the Constitution. I have sworn to support it, and every clause and line of it commands my fealty and allegiance. I have not sworn, and I never will swear, until I become an apostate from the altars of my political faith, to support that which is not in the Constitution and that which was never intended to be placed there.

WHAT WILL BE OUR PLATFORM?

I have been asked in this connection, "What will be the platform of your party at the next convention?" I can not tell. If I had a hand in its construction, it would be a Democratic platform. It would ring with the martial music of the ancient lays. I would not hang our harp upon a willow tree. As a rule, people do not read platforms, and those who read them do not believe them. I would give them something new, but that which is new is something old. I would reanimate the Constitution, which has been disfigured and defaced, and try to infuse into the minds of the people the philosophy of our institutions.

I would undoubtedly continue our historic contest against a tariff levied for protection. I do not believe that the present system should be reformed by its friends. I believe it should be reformed by its enemies.

I would agree that this Government should become a world power upon the field of commerce and of enterprise and of civilization, but I would reject every proposal to unite with any other robber government in the despoilment of foreign territory or in the conquest of helpless races.

I would with no uncertain sound declare against Executive usurpation, and would again announce the doctrine settled nearly a century ago in this body, that this is not an Executive Government, and that the President, in the exercise of his functions, must be guided by the specifications of the instrument that creates them.

I would unhesitatingly announce that the Democratic party is in favor of the enforcement of every Federal enactment upon the statute book, and the greater the criminal who violates it the more severe should be the penalties that are to be visited upon him, and that the law should be put in force against every industrial monopoly that is throttling competition and plundering the home of the American consumer.

I would limit the Presidential office to a single term, and would further proclaim that no President should have the right to determine the selection of his successor through the use of Federal patronage.

Above everything else, however, I would add a plank declaring that there is no such thing as an unwritten constitution of the United States, and that it is a treasonable act to insert into it, whether by judicial construction or otherwise, any power or grant that is not contained within the limitations of the instrument, and that no Commonwealth of the Union should be interfered with in the exercise of its sovereign functions within its own jurisdiction, and that the guaranty of the tenth amendment, so long as the integrity of our Government is maintained, must stand inviolate and unprofaned. I know it is claimed that the people are in favor of a strong centralized Government and of an Executive with imperial prerogative, and it is also claimed that the contest will be lost if we insist upon maintaining the rights of the States or weakening the power of the President, and that we ought to abandon the question of constitutional rights and accept the new revelation that has been vouchsafed to us under the present Administration. We are told that the men who made the Constitution did not comprehend what it meant, and that the President is the oracle who has relieved it of its mysteries and unfolded its true interpretation, and we are admonished that inasmuch as he has been praised and commended by prominent leaders of our party that his version of the Constitution has been approved, and that we ought to hail him as our prophet and deliverer. This is a transcendent position for the Democratic party to occupy. Speaking for myself, I regret that I can not accept his Messiahship, and I respectfully raise the standard of revolt.

THE PRESIDENT.

The trouble with the President is—and I always speak of him not only deferentially, but with great personal respect—that he regards himself as vested with unlimited executive power under the Constitution. I presented this aspect of the subject in full to the Senate at the last session, and if I ever demonstrated anything in my life, I think that I satisfied the Senate on that occasion that the article in the Constitution that vests executive power in the President is simply a distribution, and not a grant of power, and that the grant lies entirely in the specifications of the instrument. The President evidently does not agree with me, nor does he agree with any one of that distinguished group of statesmen who, in the early days of the Republic in this body, resolutely and successfully maintained the same ground. He believes, in the language of one of his panegyrists, whom I quoted literally in the address that I refer to, that his executive powers are unqualified, plenary, and unlimited. Notwithstanding the attitude of the President in reference to his constitutional prerogative, which is at utter war with every Democratic principle and tradition, an attempt has been made within our party to place us in a situation upon this subject which is almost inextricable. Some of our prominent leaders, with unrestrained exultation, have applauded the President to the echo, and in unmeasured terms have commended his revised edition of the Constitution of the United States. A wild and frantic hosanna lately pealed forth in an adjoining Chamber from Democratic bosoms as a message replete with the assumption of unlawful executive authority resounded through the Hall.

In view of this complication I would like an answer to this question, and perhaps some one can enlighten me upon it: If the President should be nominated by the next Republican convention, what will our spokesmen and orators say who have become the disciples of his creed and in worshipful idolatry have bowed at his shrine? A distinguished southern editor some time since tried to help us out of our difficulty and solve the distressing problem by suggesting that the Democratic party ought to anticipate the convention of the Republican party and by force tear away the President from his own party and nominate him as our candidate. If the Democratic party had availed itself of this advice and nominated the President as its candidate, and the Republican party had afterwards assembled in convention and torn him again away from the Democratic party and also nominated him as its candidate, I would have been placed in the most embarrassing situation that anyone could possibly occupy. I do not know what I would have done under such circumstances. I would have felt like exclaiming "The Republican party has given; the Republican party has taken away; blessed! blessed! be the name of the Republican party."

SHALL OUR PARTY DISINTEGRATE?

In view of the dilemma that confronts us, I feel that in speaking here to-day upon the subject of States rights I can only speak for myself, and that I have no right to bind my party to any utterance that I have made, and thus speaking for myself alone, I desire now to say that so far as I am concerned I do not want anyone to tell me, not even a Republican President, what the Constitution means. If I want to find out its meaning I will go to the men who framed it, and not to the men who are paraphrasing and translating it. I will examine the pages of the Federalist.

I will consult with Marshall, and with Taney, and with the Supreme Court that for the hundredth time in its last announcement, speaking through Justice Brewer in Kansas against Colorado, again proclaimed that this is a Government of delegated powers and that no invasion must be tolerated upon the reserved rights of sovereign States acting within their own jurisdiction. I know that Democrats in prominent places are clamoring for implied powers and for enlarged construction. I will admit that the Constitution is not perfect, but with all of its imperfections, I say, let it stand. I have not seen anyone yet whom I would trust to improve upon the work of Hamilton, of Franklin, of Patterson and Wilson, of Randolph and Madison, of Martin and of Mason, of Rutledge and of Pinckney.

I have always looked upon the Democratic party as the sentinel of the Constitution, and as a party man I protest against its being tampered with by scribes and mountebanks. I believe that in the coming contest we ought to plant our colors upon the tenth amendment, and make the contest clear and clean between the reserved rights of the States upon the one hand, and Federalism and centralization on the other. It is predicted that if we adopt this course that we will lose. Very well, Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I would rather lose and go down to defeat than purchase victory at the sacrifice of principle. We have been defeated over and over again, but we have never yet in all our history sounded a final and an ultimate retreat. To accept these heresies now is a cowardly surrender at the post of duty.

I want it known that we can never take this step unless we do it voluntarily. If we become the party of the Federal Government as against the rights of the States, if we are to fill our platform with the creed of the propagandist, if this is our new rôle and we are to abjectly abandon everything that we have stood for in the past and venture into this foreign field and partake of this forbidden fruit, then when history recounts the tragic manner of our death as a political party I want posterity also to know that in the hour of our brightest hopes and most alluring prospects, determined to end our great historic career, of our own free will and choice we threw ourselves upon the poisoned weapon of Federal centralization and died of a self-inflicted wound.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What disposition does the Senator from Maryland desire made of his resolution?

Mr. RAYNER. Let it lie on the table, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will lie on the table.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I ask that the consideration of the naval appropriation bill be now resumed.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 20471) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes.

The reading of the bill was resumed at page 85, line 14. The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, under the subhead "Increase of the Navy," on page 86, after line 5, to insert:

And the contract for the construction of said vessels shall be awarded by the Secretary of the Navy to the lowest best responsible bidder, having in view the best results and most expeditious delivery; and in the construction of all of said vessels the provisions of the act of August 3, 1886, entitled "An act to increase the naval establishment," as to materials for said vessels, their engines, boilers, and machinery, the contracts under which they are built, the notice of any proposals for the same; the plans, drawings, specifications therefor, and the method of executing said contracts shall be observed and followed, and, subject to the provisions of this act, all said vessels shall be built in compliance with the terms of said act, and in all their parts shall be of domestic manufacture; and the steel material shall be of domestic manufacture, and of the quality and characteristics best adapted to the various purposes for which it may be used, in accordance with specifications approved by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. GORE. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma proposes an amendment to the committee amendment which has just been stated. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

Mr. GORE. I do not recall the line where I desire my amendment to the amendment inserted, but it is after the words "best responsible bidder." I move to insert at that point the words "without reference to the residence, citizenship, or nationality of the bidder or the location of his shipyard." I believe that is all I desire to offer at this point, but I shall offer another amendment later.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma to the committee amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 86, line 8, after the words "best responsible bidder," it is proposed to insert "without reference to the residence, citizenship, or nationality of the bidder or the location of his shipyard."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. GORE. I should like to have a yea and nay vote on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HALE. Yes; let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BACON. I desire to say, Mr. President, that some parts of that amendment I should favor, and there are other parts which I should not favor. Consequently I can not vote for the amendment.

The yeas and nays having been taken, the result was announced—yeas 1, nays 62, as follows:

YEAS—1.

Gore

NAYS—62.

Aldrich	Clarke, Ark.	Hale	Piles

So Mr. GORE's amendment to the amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was rejected.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I wish to say that if I were a lover of solitude, I certainly ought to be pleased with my vote upon the amendment to the amendment, and perhaps I ought to explain the reason why I offered the amendment. It was as a beginning to rescue this country from the toils of the steel trust, which I regard as the tapeworm of the Treasury. I remember that in the testimony given before the Merchant Marine Commission a prominent shipbuilder testified that an order had recently been filled under which a hundred thousand tons of steel plate had been shipped to Belfast and delivered at $24 a ton, which ought to have made a price of $22 a ton in this country at tide water, whereas the reigning price at that time was $32 per ton.

I do not think this Government ought to stand and deliver at the demand and command of the steel trust. I believe in a strong Navy; I believe in protecting our shores and in protecting our people; but that protection can be had without enriching one trust or another in this country. They should not capitalize and make merchandise of the patriotism of this country. That provision has been one of the many reasons why we to-day have no merchant marine in the United States, and we witness the marvelous spectacle of nineteen battle ships, eleven armored cruisers, and six torpedo boats to-day, amid much acclaim, escorting eight merchant marine vessels of the United States around the globe. Of the thirty-seven vessels carrying coal for our fleet, I understand that twenty-nine do not belong to the people of this country. The reason is our ancient, antiquated, and miserable navigation laws, which require the construction of American merchant marine vessels in the United States. We are the only nation upon the globe, as I understand, which clings to that antiquated and abandoned doctrine.

I want to shake this country loose from the grip of the trust and make this as a beginning not only for a cheaper and a larger Navy, but for a cheaper, a larger, a respectable merchant marine.

Now, sir, I desire to move to strike out the clause requiring that the materials used shall be of domestic manufacture.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma proposes an amendment to the amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 86, after the word "act," in line 18, it is proposed to strike out—

And in all their parts shall be of domestic manufacture, and the steel material shall be of domestic manufacture.

Mr. HALE. I do not think anybody wants to discuss this matter. I move to lay on the table the amendment to the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine moves to lay on the table the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. GORE. I should like to have the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DANIEL (when his name was called). I would vote "nay," but I am paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH].

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who is detained by illness. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. ELKINS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. If he were here and voting, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SCOTT (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. TALIAFERRO]. As he is not here, I will withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CULLOM. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. DEPEW. I have a general pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. MCENERY]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. DAVIS. I have a general pair with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON], but by agreement it has been transferred to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN]. I vote "nay."

Mr. STONE. I have a general pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK]. He not being in the Chamber, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MONEY. My colleague [Mr. MCLAURIN] is absent on important business.

The result was announced—yeas 48, nays 9, as follows:

YEAS—48.

Aldrich	Carter	Gamble	Perkins
Allison	Clapp	Guggenheim	Piles

So Mr. HALE's motion to lay on the table the amendment of Mr. GORE to the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, as the amendment is still pending, I desire to say a word, not with any view to general discussion at all, because I recognize the fact that it would not be of practical benefit, but in support of the attitude which I occupy in regard to this matter.

I am not indifferent to the desire, which all Americans must naturally have, that, so far as practicable, all the material used in the construction of our war ships shall be domestic material. At the same time I am not willing to put myself on record that I propose to give to those who have the opportunity, by reason of enjoying monopolistic advantages, to prey upon the American people. I am in sympathy with the statement made by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] giving the reasons why he offered the first amendment. I voted against that amendment because, in my opinion, it went too far.

But I am unwilling, Mr. President, to say, when we are going to make these immense expenditures in the construction of battle ships, that, regardless of combinations which are made, and which we know are made, for the purpose of extorting from this Government extravagant prices for material, they shall have the assurance in the beginning that this Government is bound hand and foot and is obliged to submit to their exactions and their extortions, and that, regardless of how great those exactions and extortions, by law those exactions must be submitted to.

Mr. President, this is a different matter from the ordinary purchase of material. We all know the fact that the material which enters into the construction of battle ships, at least that part of it which relates to armor plate, can be made by only two or three concerns in the United States, and there is not a Senator on this floor who does not know the fact that whenever the time comes for the bidding for this material there is a combination among the producers of this material which puts the Government absolutely at the mercy of the producers of that material, if we adopt such an amendment as that proposed here, that under no circumstances can the Government have the advantage of competition, regardless of what may be the extortions and exactions. That is the reason why I voted against the proposition to lay upon the table an amendment proposing to strike out the provision which says that under all circumstances the Government shall buy from them and them alone.

Mr. President, there was a time when we in the Senate were very much more familiar with this question than we are now. Senators who were here ten years ago will remember the debates we had upon the subject of the extortionate prices charged for armor plate. We know the evidences which were brought to the attention of the Senate of extortions in the prices of armor plate; and the discussions were discussions which were not limited in the objections urged to any one party. The criticisms which were made—and more than criticisms; the denunciations which were heard upon this floor—were not limited to Senators who were opposed to the protective tariff. I recollect when the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], standing where he now sits, in the discussion of this question and speaking of the impositions, the extortions of these producers of armor plate, used the expression that they had the opportunity, and they had put the knife into us. I am using the language of the Senator. Although it is ten years ago I remember it well, that the very people that you say by this iron-clad amendment shall be protected against any and all competition—and they are the same corporations that they were then—were the very people who when they had the opportunity put the knife into us. That was the expression of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. President, we know how session after session this matter was debated in the Senate. We know how investigations made by the Naval Committee, of which I then had the honor to be a member, serving with the Senator from Maine (and there is a printed volume of testimony in the document room), disclosed that the making of armor plate cost the producer only something like $200 a ton and we were paying $500 a ton for it. We know what was the report of the experts of the Navy Department—practically to the same effect. We know how indignant the Senate was on that subject as well as the House, and we passed at one session a law which limited the price. But bound hand and foot as we were by these producers of steel plates, they simply entered into a combine and refused to bid. They held us by the throat and said "If you do not give us our prices, you shall not have battle ships."

They, as the Senator from Maine has said, had the opportunity and they continued to put the knife into us. I am quoting his language literally.

It went on from session to session. We even went to the extent of trying to get through a proposition that the Government should itself establish a factory for the manufacture of armor plate; and it was very freely stated on this floor—and no man can successfully deny the fact—that if we never made a sheet of armor plate, it would pay the Government of the United States to construct a factory to make armor plate, in order to furnish the opportunity for competition and hold these people in check. But they had power enough to prevent it. There were Senators on the other side as well as Senators on this side of the Chamber who urged it most earnestly.

Finally, I recollect, the then junior Senator from Ohio, Mr. Hanna, who had acquired great influence, suggested the proposition that this matter ought to be taken out of politics. That was his suggestion—that having it debated here was having it in politics, although there were no party lines on the subject; that it must be taken out of politics and put on a business basis; and his idea of a business basis was that Congress should have nothing to say on the question of prices, but that it should be left entirely to a matter of negotiation between the Department and the producers of these steel plates. That was the direction given to it under the powerful influence of the then junior Senator from Ohio, and that is the direction it has taken even since; and year after year we come here and provide for these immense expenditures—expenditures running, if I am correctly informed, on this bill to over $120,000,000 and with the steel trust asking possibly a hundred per cent over the cost of the material and the manufacture. And yet we are to be told not only that we are going to have the disadvantage of being almost within their power, in the absence of any such provision as this, because, of course, freights are heavy and they constitute a great protection to our manufacturers even if there were no tariff, but we have the tariff and the ocean freights to protect them—we are to be told that while we are in their power to that extent, we must give them the assurance by written law that the Secretary of the Navy shall be powerless, regardless of any exactions or any extortions, to say to them, "If you do not let me have that material at such a price, I will buy it somewhere else."

I am not in favor of buying it anywhere else as long as we can buy it at proper prices at home; and when I say "proper prices" I mean prices with the most justifiably liberal profit. I have never been in favor of holding the steel trust or the manufacturers of these steel plates down to small profits. I have always been in favor of their having large profits. I have no idea that there is going to be any material bought anywhere else. I have no idea that even if we should strike this out any material would be bought anywhere else, and I do not suppose there is any Senator who thinks the material is going to be bought anywhere else. But why should we give them this assurance?

Mr. President, any man who has watched the bids which have been made in the last six or eight years, since we put this matter upon a business basis, as the then Senator from Ohio denominated it, in other words, since Congress has ceased to look after the matter at all, since we have been in the habit of passing naval appropriation bills without knowing what was in them and without the possibility of any opportunity to dissect them or analyze them, what has been the fact with reference to bids for these vessels?

Let any man take up the bids. There are two steel plants that bid on the armor plate and bid on other materials. He will see two bids put in where two ships are to be built, and he will see the bid made by No. 1 steel plant or manufacturer of steel plates for one of those vessels just a little under that of Company No. 2; and then, put in on the same day or within a few days, he will see the bid of No. 2 Company for the other ship just a little under that of Company No. 1. There is evidence in the most plain and unmistakable manner of an arrangement between them. They will both bid on the two ships, but one will bid high and the other will bid low on a certain ship, and reverse it as to the other ship, showing a combination beyond any possibility of doubt.

Mr. President, I am not afraid to be judged on the vote in the negative, on the proposition to lay upon the table an amendment which does not seek to say that any goods shall be bought anywhere else, but simply objects to saying in the law that, regardless of extortion, regardless of exaction, you shall buy from them and from nobody else.

Mr. President, I am satisfied with the correctness of that position. We ought not to give any such assurance. I am perfectly willing that the matter shall be left without a statement one way or the other, with the full knowledge of the fact that the things are going to be bought in the United States, but I am unwilling to tie the hands of the President and the Secretary of the Navy and say that they shall not purchase anywhere else in the case of the most extravagant and extortionate charges, if such should be presented to them.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, in any contest between American labor and foreign labor and an equal contest between American capital and foreign capital I do not hesitate to say that I am for the American labor and the American capital, and I am against the foreign labor and the foreign capital. But, sir, I am not willing to rob the American people in order to enrich one trust or another, or, to use a more polite phrase, to enrich one corporation or another. Neither am I willing to jeopardize the strength and the security of the American Navy by hazarding anything as to the character of the material which shall be employed in its construction.

Much to my surprise, I heard one Senator observe during the calling of the roll that he is unwilling to trust the enemy with the making of our weapons of defense. Sir, these weapons would be made in time of peace and not in time of war; and if we have not in the United States experts sufficiently skilled to determine whether the armor be well or ill made, then, sir, our defenses are in a deplorable plight.

I did not suppose that anyone was so unsophisticated as to imagine that if this amendment were adopted one ounce or one inch of this armor plate or other material would be manufactured abroad. The steel manufacturers of the United States can and do make and manufacture steel cheaper than anybody else on the face of the earth. I have as high authority as the late Secretary Hay of the State Department for the statement that steel rails manufactured in this country are sold in Birmingham and that steel bridges manufactured in the United States are shipped thousands of miles and flung across the Nile, notwithstanding our competitors in the Old World have 4,000 miles the start.

I did not imagine that one ounce or one inch of these plates would be manufactured abroad; but, sir, I did suppose that, according to the estimates I formerly submitted, these vessels would be constructed for one-third less than they will be under the provisions of this measure, and I wanted to obtain three battle ships for the money we will expend under this measure for two battle ships.

I remember that when steel dredges were being bought for the Panama Canal Secretary Taft desired to purchase those dredges abroad at $652,000, but Congress tied his hands and obliged him to purchase the dredges in the United States at a cost of $724,000.

Sir, equivocate as you may, that transaction was cold-blooded robbery of the taxpayers of the United States. Whatever the enemies of the Secretary may say against him, the indictment should not contain a count against him in regard to that transaction. If there be anything in his public service to his credit, that effort ought to be set down in his favor.

Sir, I have no patience and very little confidence in the plaudits which are showered by Democrats upon Republican candidates, but that, at least, can not be set down to the discredit of the Secretary. The failure to adopt the amendment this morning may possibly not inure to the credit of others.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. MONEY. I want to offer an amendment to that.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator has an amendment to propose to the pending amendment, I will withhold my amendment, as it comes in subsequently.

Mr. MONEY. I ask the clerks to take down the amendment I propose. It is to insert—

That the material used in the construction of the vessels authorized by this bill, whether in the Government navy-yards or by private contract, must be of American manufacture or product, but can be purchased in any market in the world.

I will state the purpose of my amendment. American manufactures of steel and iron are sold abroad very much cheaper than they are sold at home. The United States, at least as the constructor of its own ships and in its own navy-yards, should have the benefit of the markets of the world in buying American manufactured steel and iron, and the private contractors in the building of these ships should also have the same privilege. It is not necessary to have the tax of a prohibitive tariff on goods manufactured in America to be used in the construction of these ships. If this is denied, it is now attempted, it seems to me, not only to rob the people under the form of law, as the Supreme Court once said about this sort of legislation, but also the Government itself in the construction of its own ships.

I do not see that there can be a good objection when we say that the material is of American manufacture. Let the Government have the benefit, at least, of competition with all the balance of the world in any market in the world.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do not conceive that there is any necessity for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi. The clause that is found in the bill which is sought to be amended is the same that has been in all the naval appropriation acts since 1886, referring to that as the fundamental law. The fundamental proposition on material is that all of it shall be of domestic or American manufacture. There is nothing said about where it shall be purchased or where the market shall be. Being well enough as it is, I do not think it is advisable to suggest by any amendment the likelihood or possibility of seeking to purchase any of this material abroad, even if it shall be of American manufacture. I think the bill is more symmetrical as it is, and I should not be willing, for one, to agree to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi. I do not think it will accomplish any real purpose.

If the Department at any time shall find that the discrepancies between the prices here and the prices of American material abroad are so great, they can go to the foreign country. The present bill authorizes that to be done, but I do not believe any such condition is likely to arise.

Mr. MONEY. In reply to the Senator, I will say that there certainly can be no harm done by the insertion of this amendment. The theory of the bill is that all material shall be of American manufacture. I yield that to the Senator, but why deny the right of any contractor the privilege of competition in the markets of the world for this American manufacture? I have introduced the amendment because it is a well-known fact—and I am not disclosing a revelation to the Senate—that the American manufacturer does send his iron products abroad and sells them in the foreign markets very much cheaper than to his fellow-citizens at the door of his manufactory.

There is no dispute about that proposition, and as long as we are securing the American manufactured article, and thereby encouraging manufacture in this country, why not permit the Government and the contractor—for it comes out of the price of the vessel if he has that privilege—to get these same goods anywhere they can be found at the price in that market? If it should so happen that there is no lower price anywhere else than there is at home, there will be no need to purchase it abroad.

It is simply a privilege of which the Government constructor and the private constructor in private yards can avail themselves, in order to put the American product in the manufacture of the ships of our own, to buy the goods wherever they are offered the cheapest anywhere in the world. I can not see how any protectionist can object to that provision, unless it is intended that the manufacturer shall put his hand into everybody's pocket, including that of the Government, even in the manufacture of the means of national defense.

Mr. BURKETT. I should like to ask the Senator a question. I have been reading that section. It seems to me that nothing in it prohibits buying domestic products anywhere in the world.

Mr. MONEY. I wish to ask the Senator from Maine a question. Is this provision in the bill already? Is there anything like this permitted in the bill? If so, my amendment would be absolutely useless, and I withdraw it.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator ask if the provision contained on page 86 is in the present statute of last year and the year before—that it is the present law?

Mr. MONEY. What I ask is, if the law now permits these contractors to purchase material abroad?

Mr. HALE. I have just said, and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] has also made the suggestion, that there is nothing in the law as it is now that forbids purchasing abroad for the construction of the ships and armor material of steel of American manufacture. I would not think it advisable or desirable to put it in in terms in the bill. I do not think it is needed. I do not think the question will ever arise, but, undoubtedly, it can be done if any contractor chooses to do it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. MONEY. Excuse me a moment. If that is so, and I have no doubt it is—I was not aware of it—my amendment would be useless. But I recollect how it was in the Panama matter, when I offered the same amendment, and it was rejected, and you were compelled to purchase in America articles of American manufacture at a very great loss to the Government. That was abundantly shown at the time. Yet the Republican party lined itself over there in compelling the United States to furnish American products at home and not abroad, when it was much cheaper. So I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It may illuminate what has been said to state that as far as armor plate is concerned, the United States has paid less for its armor than any other power in the world excepting only Japan. I have the figures here.

Mr. MONEY. In reply to the Senator from Indiana, I will state that I happened, fifteen years ago, to be on the committee that investigated the plate-armor fraud at the Carnegie and the Homestead works. That committee published a volume of about 1,200 pages. It showed the grossest frauds, admitted by the superintendent of the office, the jockeying of the instrument that measured the tensile strength of the bolt that confined the armor to the ship, jockeying about substituting lower plates for other plates that had been tried at Indianhead, the Department having made a ballistic test there. These frauds were confessed, and Mr. Carnegie was fined very heavily by the Secretary of the Navy, and the fine was in great part remitted by Mr. Cleveland. I knew about different frauds; and at the same time we were paying $550 a ton for this rotten armor.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. MONEY. The then Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. Chandler, offered a provision to reduce the price about one-half, and he read a contract which these same works had with Russia to supply them with armor we were paying $550 a ton for at the rate of $230 a ton. That is a part of the record.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not want to prolong the debate, but I have directly authoritative figures here. The Senator is inaccurate as to the amount paid for armor plate. I again repeat the statement that we pay less for armor plate, as shown by the figures, than any other power in the world, excepting only Japan.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, we have heard in this Chamber time after time about what is paid in other countries. The fact stated by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], of course, all Senators who were here then remember. It is not a question whether or not we are paying more than other countries. It is a question whether we are paying more than a legitimate profit to those who produce it in this country.

I repeat the statement, Mr. President, that this matter has been thoroughly investigated and the facts were brought to the attention of the Senate. Reports are now to be had in the document room, if any Senator desires them. The Senator from Maine and myself served on the committee of investigation and sat during a large part of the recess, if I recollect correctly, taking testimony and hearing all sides, hearing naval officers, the Secretary of the Navy, manufacturers of the Bethlehem steel plant and the Carnegie steel plant, and all the others. It is all there. I have forgotten the exact figures, but the conclusion I think was, to the best of my recollection, that the cost of plate was somewhere in the neighborhood of $200 a ton, and at that time we were paying as high as $550 a ton for it—a most extravagant price. There is no question about it in the world. A ton of steel is not much larger than the top of one of these desks—certainly not larger than the entire desk, if that. While the machinery is ponderous and the methods of manufacture are ponderous, they are simple. But we can not go into that now to any great extent.

I simply wish to reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE]. It is impracticable to debate the question at length now because of the fact that it requires considerable investigation to present the figures. There is no inducement to present them, because we all know what is going to be done. The question is not, What is the pay in other countries? The question is, What does it cost in this country, and what is the legitimate profit on it?

Now, I am going to offer an amendment, and we will see whether it will be objectionable or not. The amendment is to add the following proviso:

Provided, That the President shall be authorized to purchase any part of said material abroad in any case where the material of domestic manufacture can not, in his judgment, be purchased at a reasonable price, having regard to the cost of manufacture and a reasonable profit thereon.

I send the amendment to the desk, and I trust it will be adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the Senator from Mississippi to have withdrawn his amendment.

Mr. BACON. I so understand.

Mr. HALE. Let us have a vote on the amendment now presented.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. BACON. I call for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senators to the fact that a similar provision after full discussion was adopted in the measure which required material for the Panama Canal to be purchased in this country, and, as is suggested to me by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], the language was even stronger than that which I have employed. It does seem to me to be the most reasonable of provisions. It leaves it all to the President of the United States.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Is it in the same language?

Mr. BACON. I can not say that it is the same language. I say it is suggested to me that it is not so strong as the language then used, but it is to the same effect. It simply relieves the situation from that which I have spoken of. Under the amendment as it is now phrased the producers of this material are put upon notice that under the law, as we now propose to enact it, regardless of the question of extortion or of exaction, the President is not at liberty to buy any material except that which they themselves manufacture. I understand there are now but two factories in the United States, and they are in a close combination, with the power to put the price at anything they see fit, regardless of what it may be worth elsewhere, or regardless of the cost here with a reasonable profit thereon. I simply desire that they shall be put upon notice that they must have a reasonable price and that they must have a reasonable profit and no more.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to have the amendment read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

The SECRETARY. On page 86, following the word "Navy," in line 23, add the following proviso:

Provided, That the President shall be authorized to purchase any part of said material abroad in any case where the material of domestic manufacture can not, in his judgment, be purchased at a reasonable price, having regard to the cost of manufacture and a reasonable profit thereon.

Mr. TELLER. I think that is the language of the Panama Canal amendment, but in that case the President was in entire charge of the operations down there. Under this bill, on page 86, I find that the contract for the construction of such vessels shall be awarded by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. BACON. That had escaped me. I am perfectly willing that the words "Secretary of the Navy" shall be substituted for the word "President." I ask that the amendment be so modified.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be so modified. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia as modified.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. DAVIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. FULTON], but I transfer my pair to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN], and I vote "yea."

Mr. SCOTT (when his name was called). I have a standing pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. TALIAFERRO]. I make the announcement now and for future roll calls.

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK]. I will transfer my pair to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR] and vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I ask if the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. WARREN. I withhold my vote, as I am paired with that Senator.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DEPEW. I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. MCENERY]. If he were here I should vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], who is absent. I will transfer my pair to the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and vote. I vote "nay."

The Secretary recapitulated the vote.

Mr. DEPEW. I transfer my pair to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. DANIEL. I am paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH]. Otherwise I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 36, not voting 32, as follows:

YEAS—24.

Bacon	Clarke, Ark.	Frazier	Nelson
Bankhead	Clay	Gary	Overman
Beveridge	Culberson	Gore	Paynter
Borah	Davis	Johnston	Rayner
Brown	Dixon	McCreary	Smith, Md.

So Mr. BACON's amendment to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, as we have got to buy this material in this country, regardless of what may be the disposition of those who alone can furnish it, in fixing the price, I should like to know from the Senator from Maine something about what its cost is to be. As I stated before, it has been a good while since we have had this matter discussed in the Senate, since the then Senator from Ohio, the late Mr. Hanna, urged that the matter should be taken away from the consideration of Congress and put upon business methods. I should like to know what is the price that we now pay for armor upon these ships?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do not desire to prolong the debate, because I am very hopeful of the Senate acting upon the bill to-night, but I will answer the Senator from Georgia, without further remark, that the average price that we are now paying is $416 and a fraction per ton. Twelve or fifteen years ago we were paying $550 and $600 per ton; but the present average is about $416 and a fraction, as I have said.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask the Senator whether, in arriving at the average, he takes the average of the different prices or whether he takes the average of the total price? The Senator will see the difference. There may be a small amount at a high price and a large amount at a low price, or it may be reversed, and there may be a large amount at a high price and a small amount at a low price, and the average would be the average price. I want to know what the average cost is, what the average total expenditure is—that is, the entire amount, the number of dollars divided by the number of tons, that being the way to get at it.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I understand that the average is made up at any given time by the prices that are paid by contract upon the ships under contract, as any average would be made. It does not vary much. It is not a question of the average being cut down by a small amount being purchased for a lower price, because the large contracts for armor are always the ones upon which the average is reckoned; and the result is that we are paying, and have in the last contracts paid, an average, as I have said, of $416 and a fraction per ton.

Mr. BACON. It doubtless is due entirely to my lack of capacity for understanding what the Senator says, but he has not answered my question as I intended it to be understood. Possibly I have not made myself clear; possibly I have, and then I do not understand the Senator. There is a very marked difference, which anyone will readily recognize, between the average in price and the average in cost. You get the average price by getting the average of the different prices. You get the average cost by taking the number of pounds or tons and dividing it into the number of dollars expended for the entire amount purchased. They are two very different things. I desired, if I might trespass upon the time of the Senator from Maine, to ascertain whether it was the average in price or the average in cost which he had given us.

Mr. HALE. It is the same thing, Mr. President. When the tables are given of the average cost, that means the cost to us, what we pay. You might just as well call it "price," but as we make up the tables "cost" means cost to the Government, what it pays. That is the price. It is not the price that is asked, but it is what we pay, what it costs us.

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, I must say that I can not agree with the Senator from Maine that the average price is the same thing as the average cost. They are two very different things, as I will illustrate.

Mr. HALE. The whole average price paid is the average cost.

Mr. BACON. Not necessarily.

Mr. HALE. I do not see the difference.

Mr. BACON. I will try to suggest it to the Senator, and see whether or not he will see it.

Mr. President, if there was one price of $200 and another price of $100, the average price would be $150; but if there were ten times as much purchased of the material at $200 as there was of the material at $100, $150 would not be the average cost. There is the distinction, and a very plain one. I desire to know of the Senator whether the response which he gave was as to the average price or as to the average cost.

Mr. HALE. It was as to the average cost. Mr. President, there never is any case where, in the bids for this large armor, there is any very great difference. There is not one offer to furnish for $100 and another concern offering to furnish armor for $200, so that the danger which the Senator anticipates of an average cost not showing the real cost does not exist. The bids are all close; they are near each other, and are finally decided. Then we are given what is the average cost to us, which is the price we pay.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I presume it is true—it certainly was years ago; I do not know whether it is so now or not—that different prices were charged for different kinds of armor on the same ship—some of it being very much higher than others. It is for that reason that, if the Senator has the information, I desired to know whether the amount named by him was an average of prices or an average of cost, because there may be a very great and material difference between the two. I think anyone with reasonable mathematical faculty will see the difference. Do I understand the Senator is unable to give me a direct answer to the question?

Mr. HALE. No. I understand I have given the Senator a direct answer—all the answer I can give.

Mr. BACON. That is very manifest.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. The average price, as I understand, of armor in this country is $416 per ton. Can the Senator from Maine inform the Senate what is the average price per ton in other countries—in England or Germany, for instance?

Mr. HALE. I have, Mr. President, a table of the prices per ton for furnishing armor in the European countries. In Austria it is $449; in Italy, $521; in Germany, $450; in France, $500; in England, $625; and in the United States it is $416.67.

Mr. BACON. Now, Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if it is not true that there is a large difference in the price of armor of one kind and the price of armor of another kind on the same ship? In other words, is there not a higher price for certain parts of the armor than there is for other parts of the armor?

Mr. HALE. No; there is no great difference in the large supplies. In each ship there is some small armor that does not cost so much, but that does not figure largely in the result, because the amount is small. The general armor which is furnished is of the price which I have indicated, the higher price, because it is of a higher quality; it is thicker, it costs more, and it makes up almost all the protection of the ship.

Mr. BACON. Does not the Senator recall—if I am in error, he will correct me, I know, because he is very much more familiar with the matter than I am—that in the days when we had the discussions as to the reasonableness of the prices that were being charged there was one class of armor the price of which was at that time, I think, $550—if I recollect aright, that was approximately it—and that one defense that was made of that price was that there was not much of that kind of armor and that the larger part of the armor was of a lower price. I think that was true then; I do not know whether it is now or not.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia will permit me a moment, I will ask the Senator from Maine if he does not recollect the fact that in the manufacture of armor the ingot passes, when it is sufficiently heated, under the hydraulic hammer, which presses it to the thickness required—whether 12 or 20 inches—leaving a little to the planer. The planer then goes over the plate and smoothes it. Then the plate is cut in two through its longest axis and is called the upper and lower plate. In the casting of these ingots, I do not care how much care may be used, there are certain ingredients that settle mostly to the bottom, and the lower plate is some 20 or 30 per cent better than the upper plate, and therefore is sold for a greater price than the upper plate that came from the same ingot. The Senator, I know, will recollect that it was a common trick of the Carnegie Works, when a lieutenant or Government inspector had selected from a group of thirty plates one plate that was to stand the test for the whole and had put his mark upon it, to substitute for an upper plate a lower plate, which would stand the ballistic test that the upper plate would not stand. Now, the Senator must know that there was not the same price paid for the lower and upper plates from the same ingot.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do remember generally the old investigation, the question about open-hearth and other steel, the charge that imperfect armor had been imposed upon the Government by some of these companies, and the investigation accomplished its object. Two things resulted—the price paid by the Government for this armor was reduced and, so far as known, the frauds and abuses that were disclosed by the investigation have vanished. There are a great many other things in connection with that investigation as it has passed and gone into the limbo of the past that I am very glad to say I have forgotten. I do not claim to carry in my mind every detail of what took place in an investigation twenty years ago or twelve years ago. I am more interested in the result of the investigation, and I am convinced, as I have said, that two things were accomplished—the reduction of the price and the disappearance of the abuses.

I do not say that everything is perfect—I do not know of any human transaction that is—but we are getting armor to-day, and good armor, at a lower price than we paid a number of years ago.

Sir William White, who is an expert upon everything relating to navies and the construction of ships, says that we have got the best ships, considering construction, armament, gunnery, and everything that makes up the efficiency of ships, that any nation in the world has got, and that contents me. It was not a surprise to me; I believed it before; but I was glad to have the testimony of so acute, discriminating, and searching an investigator as Sir William White.

Now, as I say, I can not follow the Senators in remembering everything that occurred in this investigation years ago. My mind is not able to compass all of that load of accumulated memories.

Mr. BACON. The Senator recollects the language which I quoted from him this morning, does he not?

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will repeat it, I will take his recollection for mine.

Mr. BACON. I asked the Senator if he did not remember standing where he now stands when a naval appropriation bill was before the Senate and speaking of the time when the manufacturers of steel plates had the opportunity to do so, and using the language "They put the knife into us?"

Mr. HALE. Quite likely. I hope I have used that trenchant phrase to some purpose about other things where the knife has been put in; but when the knife has ceased to be put in and the wounds have ceased to be inflicted and the grievance has passed, I have held my peace.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I simply want to ask the Senator from Maine a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. GORE. I will ask the Senator from Maine if Sir William White's estimate of our Navy is not based on the fact that we have postponed building until recent improvements were made, whereas the British had spent hundreds of millions prior to those improvements and for that reason their vessels were obsolete and our vessels were superior to theirs? He did not say that of those built at the same time the American vessels were superior to the English vessels, unless I am mistaken.

Mr. HALE. I will ask the Senator to repeat his question.

Mr. GORE. The question I asked was this: If Sir William White did not state that the reason why our Navy was superior to the British navy was because we had postponed building our ships until modern and recent inventions and improvements were made, whereas Great Britain had spent hundreds of millions in the construction of ships prior to those inventions and improvements, and consequently many of her vessels were obsolete, and for that reason our Navy as a whole was superior to hers? I do not think he stated that of the ships built by England and the United States during the last few years, one was superior to the other, but he based his estimate on the fact that many British vessels were obsolete.

Mr. HALE. No, Mr. President, he stated that we were fortunate in having waited as we did and not beginning upon models now obsolete, as Great Britain did; but the significance of what he said was that ship for ship, class for class, construction year by year, up to the present time our ships were fully equal to any ships in the world.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not propose to provoke a serious discussion of any length, but I desire to reply to one expression which fell from the lips of the Senator from Maine. The Senator from Maine says that when the abuses ceased he held his peace. The point to which I desire to direct the attention of the honorable Senator is this, that the abuses did exist, that no man was more sensible of the fact than the Senator from Maine, and no one more outspoken in his denunciation and condemnation than the Senator from Maine. I am not saying that any abuses exist now, but I am trying to guard against the possibility of the repetition of those abuses. The same people who perpetrated the abuses which the Senator denounced are the people with whom we now have to deal. My sole purpose to-day has been to put the Government of the United States in a position in the passage of this bill where, if those who abused our confidence in the past should again attempt to abuse it, we would not be powerless and helpless and at their mercy.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I shall join the Senator, who is a very faithful public servant, when the time comes and I believe any such grievance exists, any such wrong is brought to light—I shall join him in trying to eradicate that abuse.

Mr. BACON. I do not doubt it at all; but I suggest to the Senator, without pursuing the matter further, that the time to guard against it, to save the country from the loss, is not after the abuse has been perpetrated, but before it has been perpetrated, and put restraints upon the contractors, so that they can not again perpetrate these abuses.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 86, line 24, after the word "colliers," it is propsed to strike out "16-knot" and to insert "of 14 knots trial;" in the same line, after the word "speed," to insert "when carrying;" and in line 25, after the word "hundred," to strike out "capacity" and insert "tons of," so as to read:

Two fleet colliers of 14 knots trial speed when carrying not less than 12,500 tons of cargo and bunker coal.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 87, line 2, after the word "yard," to insert "on the Pacifice coast," so as to make the clause read:

Two fleet colliers of 14 knots trial speed when carrying not less than 12,500 tons of cargo and bunker coal. One of said colliers to be built in such Government yard on the Pacific coast as the Secretary of the Navy shall direct. Cost not to exceed $1,800,000 each, and toward the construction of both $1,500,000 is hereby appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 87, after line 5, to insert:

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to purchase three new steam colliers of American registry, ready for service, having a cargo-carrying capacity of 7,200 tons dead weight each, at a cost not exceeding $600,000 each; and the sum of $1,800,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purchase of the colliers above authorized.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Maine a question in regard to the amendment on page 87. I will say to the Senator from Maine that if he observed my vote he must have noticed that I voted against any proposition to build any part of the Navy anywhere else than in the United States; but, in line 7, the amendment provides that these three vessels must be of "American registry, ready for service." As I understand that provision, it means that these ships are to be bought at once and are to be of American registry. Have I the right understanding of the provision?

Mr. HALE. Oh, yes; they are simon-pure, American-built colliers.

Mr. BURKETT. The amendment provides that they shall be of American registry, and it provides, as I understand, that they must be bought at once. The Senator in the debate on the floor the other day, when we had another matter up, made the statement that there were practically no vessels of American registry at present available for colliers. I questioned the Senator's statement at that time, and thought it was a matter of price more than of possibility. As I recall, the Senator's statement was that there were under American registry no ships to be had which were suitable for colliers.

I will also say that a day or two after that colloquy on the floor of the Senate with the Senator from Maine I received a letter from the Merchant Marine League, at Cleveland, Ohio, reiterating that statement and stating that there were practically no ships in American registry that were suitable for colliers, and calling attention to the fact to which the Senator from Maine referred that, when these colliers had to be bought for the Spanish war, we had to take yachts and tugs and any old thing we could pick up for the emergency.

Now, it occurs to me—and that is why I am asking the Senator the question—that the paragraph ought to be amended so that, if this statement is correct, that there are no vessels under American registry which are suitable for colliers, we ought not by law to compel the Secretary of the Navy to buy three of them and buy them at once and to buy them ready for use. If you want vessels of American registry, you ought to give some time to have them built, if necessary. That is the reason why I ask the question. I may misunderstand the paragraph, I will say to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. So far as concerns any statement that I may have made about there being American ships available as colliers at the time when the fleet was equipped, if I made it so broad as to exclude the fact that there might be instances of ships like the three that are provided for here, I went too far. But my purpose was to show that for the great number of ships as colliers that the Department needed and must have to start the fleet on its voyage there was nothing in the American ship market commensurate with the needs. I still believe, and think I know, that that is the fact. There are very few ships, and there were very few ships. Whether these ships were offered I do not know, and I am not inclined to censure the Department under the then existing conditions that it did not wait longer and hunt up every possible ship that it could find.

These ships are put in the appropriation bill because the Department has investigated and the committee has considered the cost of other colliers somewhat larger, but not greatly so, and believe that the price is low and that it will be to the advantage of the Government to buy these three colliers; that it is a good trade. I believe that the Government ought to take advantage of the offer and secure these vessels. The ones that are here provided for cost more than double this sum, and to build absolutely new ones would undoubtedly cost double. But the Department has examined and found that they are good ships and that it can make a good bargain, and that is why they were put in here.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I desire to ask the Senator to modify the language used in the amendment, so that the Department may purchase ships of approximately that size, provided it can buy them at a lower rate. I have a constituent who has one or two colliers that he thinks would come within this description, but perhaps they would not if the language is so rigid as that now used by the Senator in his amendment. I would suggest that he use the words "approximately 7,200 tons," in order that it should not be held to apply rigidly to any particular ships. In other words, my suggestion would leave the matter open to competition. There are other colliers that the Government can buy, and it should not be embarrassed by the limitation.

Mr. HALE. I see no objection to the insertion of the word "approximately" after the word "of."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the committee amendment, on page 87, line 8, before the words "seven thousand," insert "approximately," so as to read:

Having a cargo-carrying capacity of approximately 7,200 tons dead weight each.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BURKETT. I want to say a word in reply to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. CULBERSON. Will the Senator from Nebraska yield in order that the amendment as it is proposed to be amended may be stated?

Mr. BURKETT. Certainly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment as proposed to be amended.

The SECRETARY. On page 87, after line 5, insert the following:

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to purchase three new steam colliers of American registry, ready for service, having a cargo-carrying capacity of approximately 7,200 tons dead weight each, at a cost not exceeding $600,000 each; and the sum of $1,800,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purchase of the colliers above authorized.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand the only amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island is the insertion of the word "approximately," in line 8.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island to the amendment.

Mr. BURKETT. I submit to the Senator from Maine that in the light of what was said on the floor the other day and in the light of the letter which I have received from the Merchant Marine League of the United States at Cleveland, there ought to be more leeway given to the Secretary of the Navy to contract for these vessels. I am willing, if this is a part of the Navy proper, that it shall be of American construction, and all that sort of thing.

After submitting some remarks, as I did the other day, the secretary of the Merchant Marine League in Cleveland addressed me a letter criticising considerably my remarks, which I will say substantiated everything that I contended for. But he makes the statement, speaking of the American trans-Atlantic combination, which has 130 ships, that there are only 10 of them under American registry. And note these words:

And not more than one of its American steamers is at all adapted to carrying coal to the Pacific.

"Carrying coal to the Pacific," which, I understand, is the object of a collier.

Later on he makes this statement in the letter in reenforcing what the Senator from Maine says:

No American steamers at all were offered. * * * They were not offered for the simple reason that they did not exist. Our coastwise tonnage, large as it is, does not contain many large steamships of the collier type suitable for the 13,000-mile voyage to the Pacific Ocean.

Then he goes on and makes this statement:

The numerous auxiliaries purchased in the Spanish war were chiefly yachts and tugboats.

The Senator from Maine and two or three other Senators, speaking of that the other day, used practically the same language, and referred to the fact that when the Spanish war came on we had very hastily to buy whatever we could get for colliers, and the result was that we did buy—I think this is the Senator's own language—yachts and tugboats and all that sort of thing, and they soon became of no use or fell into disuse as a matter of fact.

I submit when we are going to buy these colliers we ought not to put in a provision, in this time of peace, when there is no great urgency, although there is urgency in having colliers, but no immediate, precipitant urgency, compelling the Secretary of the Navy to go right out among a limited number of boats and pick up tugs and yachts again.

It seems to me if, in line 6, before the word "purchase," words could be put in so that it would read "the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to contract for the purchase of three steam colliers of American registry" and leave out the words "ready for service" it would be much better. You would then provide for the colliers and not limit it to a very few ships and to those entirely unsuitable. I do not like to offer the amendment without some indorsement of the Senator from Maine, because he is more familiar with the subject than I am.

Mr. HALE. The committee believed there could be no greater emergency showing the necessity of equipping the Navy with a suitable force of colliers than the spectacle disclosed to the world of a great fleet traversing the seas, as to which three-fourths or more of all its attendant colliers necessary had to be chartered from foreigners. The committee believed that that demonstrated that we ought to proceed at once in equipping the Navy with a considerable force of colliers. It believes, as I have said—I do not like to repeat—that these colliers fill the bill, and we are the more ready to buy them because they are ready to be used, and we are the more ready to buy them because the transaction, if completed, is not invested with any suspicion that the owners are trying to get an unfair price and impose upon the Government. But investigation shows that they can be bought remarkably cheap, and that is why I should not be willing to consent to an amendment that changes it entirely and which might be construed as authorizing a contract for the building. I think it is good policy to buy these colliers. I never heard of them until it came up and the investigation was made and the Department looked into it and recommended it. I believe it is a good thing and in the right direction. If the Senate does not want to authorize these colliers it will reduce the bill so much.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of line 17 on page 87.

Mr. HALE. I offer the amendment I send to the desk. It is one of the amendments that increases the amount which I alluded to yesterday morning.

The SECRETARY. On page 87, line 16, before the word "millions," to strike out "one" and insert "three," and at the end of line 17, to add:

And for the completion of the submarine boats heretofore authorized.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I offer an amendment, to be inserted on page 87, after line 17.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is it a committee amendment?

Mr. JOHNSTON. No, sir.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Then it is not yet in order, the committee amendments not having been disposed of.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Alabama has an amendment to be inserted after line 17.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is it to be offered as a committee amendment?

Mr. HALE. No; but it is an amendment agreed to by the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 87, after line 17, insert:

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to contract for or purchase one destroyer or torpedo boat of the type known as "subsurface," "semisubmerged" (or the like), the essential feature of which is to have during its operation some portion of the hull or superstructure always on or above the surface, such vessel to cost not to exceed $400,000 and to have a speed not less than 22 knots; also two small vessels of like type having a speed of not less than 16 knots and to cost not to exceed $22,500 each: Provided, That before any vessel of the type provided for in this paragraph shall be purchased or contracted for a vessel of such type shall have been constructed complete and of full size for naval warfare and submitted to the Navy Department for such trial and tests as the Secretary of the Navy may, in his discretion, prescribe, and as the result of such tests be demonstrated to have fulfilled all the reasonable requirements of naval warfare for a vessel of its class, and for these vessels the sum of $445,000 is hereby appropriated.

Mr. HALE. This is a provision which was thoroughly looked into by the House committee, reported to the House, but which was stricken out on a point of order.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. I desire to submit an amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is it a committee amendment?

Mr. OVERMAN. No. I thought we were through with the committee amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. All committee amendments have not yet been considered.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of line 3 on page 88.

Mr. HALE. I submit an amendment to be inserted after line 3 on page 88.

The SECRETARY. On page 88, after line 3, add as a new paragraph the following:

Toward the construction and machinery and armor and armament of the vessels herein authorized, $7,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of line 9 on page 88.

Mr. HALE. I submit the amendment I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. In line 8, page 88, strike out "$18,677,962" and insert "$21,177,962."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Also the following.

The SECRETARY. On page 88, at the end of line 9, add as a new paragraph the following:

New trunked-in ammunition hoists for battle ships and armored cruisers, $500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 88, line 11, after the words "Navy Department," to strike out "at Washington," and in line 12, before the word "given," to strike out "be" and insert "is herein;" so as to make the clause read:

That no part of any sum appropriated by this act shall be used for any expense of the Navy Department unless specific authority is herein given for such expenditure.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 88, after line 13, to insert:

So much of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for other purposes," approved May 4, 1898, as provides that monitors owned by the United States shall be named for the States, and shall not be named for any city, place, or person until the names of the States shall have been exhausted, is hereby repealed, and monitors now owned by the United States or hereafter built may be named as the President may direct.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. CULBERSON. I desire to ask the Senator from Maine a question. On page 88, after line 3, an amendment was adopted. I will ask the Secretary to state it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will again be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 88, after line 3, add as a new paragraph the following:

Toward the construction and machinery and armor and armament of the vessels herein authorized, $7,000,000.

Mr. CULBERSON. I desire to know of the chairman of the committee if the proviso beginning at the bottom of page 87 applies to this increase of $7,000,000 in the amendment adopted.

Mr. HALE. Which is the proviso?

Mr. CULBERSON (reading):

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for armor for vessels except upon contracts for such armor when awarded by the Secretary of the Navy to the lowest responsible bidder, having in view the best results and most expeditious delivery.

I desire to know if that proviso applies to this amendment.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. CULBERSON. Ought it not, then, to appear before the proviso?

Mr. HALE. I see the point the Senator makes—that the proviso at the bottom of page 87——

Mr. CULBERSON. Should apply to the amendment inserted on the floor.

Mr. HALE. Let us see.

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for armor for vessels except upon contracts for such armor when awarded by the Secretary of the Navy to the lowest responsible bidder, having in view the best results and most expeditious delivery.

Yes; the Senator is right. There are two ways of getting at it. We can say that no part of this appropriation or of any appropriation for armor in this bill shall be expended, and so forth; or the proviso can be transposed and put in afterwards.

Mr. CULBERSON. I hope the Senator will prepare an amendment which will make the proviso applicable to the amendment inserted on the floor.

Mr. HALE. That is right; it ought to be. Mr. President, I will ask that the proviso at the bottom of page 87 be stricken out and that it be inserted after the amendment of $7,000,000 just agreed to by the Senate.

The SECRETARY. On page 87, line 24, strike out the proviso beginning after the word "dollars" and insert it at the end of the amendment agreed to after line 3, on page 88.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. May I make an inquiry of the Senator from Maine?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I desire to know whether in this bill or in any provision of law authority is given to the Secretary of the Navy to reject any bids that he may not approve of?

Mr. HALE. The same authority is given under the act of 1886 that——

Mr. BACON. Is there a general law applying in all cases?

Mr. HALE. Yes; it applies in all cases.

Mr. BACON. That is what I wish to know.

Mr. HALE. Yes. Mr. President, on page 52, line 14, there is an amendment which I omitted to offer.

The SECRETARY. On page 52, after line 14, insert:

The pay of enlisted men of the Hospital Corps shall be the same as that provided for the corresponding ratings of the seaman branch and other staff corps of the Navy.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first passed-over amendment appears on page 3. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, after line 6, the committee reported to insert an amendment which, as heretofore amended, reads as follows:

The pay of all active and retired commissioned officers, warrant officers, midshipmen, and pay clerks in the Navy, civilian professors and civilian instructors at the Naval Academy, is hereby increased 20 per cent. And the pay of all active and retired noncommissioned officers, mates, and other petty officers, musicians, and other enlisted persons in the Navy is hereby increased 10 per cent: Provided, That the word "pay" as used in this paragraph shall be exclusive of all additions in the form of allowances or commutations, and section 1267, Revised Statutes, shall not apply to officers of the Navy: Provided further, That hereafter the pay and allowances of professors of mathematics, naval constructors, and civil engineers and assistant civil engineers in the Navy shall be the same as are or may be provided by or in pursuance of law for officers of the same rank in the Medical and Pay Corps of the Navy, but nothing herein contained shall be construed so as to reduce the pay or allowances now authorized by law for any officer or enlisted man of the Navy. And the rate of pay herein established shall continue to be in force until changed by new enactment of law.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I believe the amendment on page 3, was passed over upon my request.

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. Just a word as to it.

Mr. President, I appreciate fully the perplexities under which the Senator has arranged this proposed pay statute. More than a year ago a tender was made in the way of an amendment to the annual appropriation bill for the Army to raise the pay of the United States fighting force. It was thought best at that time to pass it over for another year, and during that year there has been a joint committee of naval and Army officers at work upon pay schedules and upon the question of increased pay for the enlisted men and commissioned officers of the entire fighting force.

It finally took form in a bill introduced in both the House and the Senate called the "Dick-Capron bill," which raised the pay of the Army and Navy, and proposed to pay the commissioned officers of the Army and Navy the same equal salaries for corresponding offices, and in the same way that they are now paid; that is to say, that the first nine rear-admirals should receive the same pay each as the six major-generals of the Army, that the junior rear-admirals should receive the same pay as brigadier-generals, and so on down.

It was thought best early in the session to divide the question and to take up the increase of the pay for the Army in the Committee on Military Affairs and the Committee on Naval Affairs to take up the pay of the Navy. From the Military Committee we brought in a bill, independently of the appropriation bill, in order to make a start, and it passed in the Senate, granting a raise for the commissioned officers of percentages ranging from 5 per cent for lieutenant-general to 25 per cent for lieutenants. In short, it ran 5 per cent on Lieutenant-General, 10 per cent on major-generals, 15 per cent on brigadier-generals, 20 per cent, I believe, on the field officers, and 25 per cent on captains and lieutenants. That bill also provided that the enlisted force might be paid in the same way as the naval force had been paid heretofore—that is to say, upon the recommendation of the President.

As I expected, that was not satisfactory to the Senate. The bill, however, was passed in another form and the matter practically sent back to the committee with the understanding on this floor that in the appropriation bill we should provide a schedule which would give the exact pay of each class of enlisted men, noncommissioned officers, privates, and so forth. The appropriation bill passed the Senate, and it is now in conference.

I wish to say to the Senator for his information that as far as we have gone in the conference, which we were obliged to delay on account of the absence of some of the House conferees, it seems that it will not be possible in that conference to obtain a greater increase than the following: Nothing at all for Lieutenant-General; $500 additional per annum for major-generals; $500 additional for brigadier-generals; $500 additional for colonels, lieutenant-colonels, and majors, and perhaps $400 to $500 additional for captains, and $200 to $300 additional for lieutenants.

The measure proposed by the Committee on Naval Affairs provides 20 per cent additional all around, which would, if applied to the salary of the Admiral, make a raise of some twenty-seven hundred dollars. As to the first nine of the rear-admirals, it would raise their pay $1,500 each per annum, making their salary $9,000 per annum. The bill that passed the Senate for the Army would have added $750 per annum for major-generals—the rank corresponding—but $500 is the probable sum that we will have to compromise on. Thus, instead of senior rear-admirals and major-generals being equal, as before, the former would get $9,000 per annum, while the latter would get $8,000.

So if the naval bill should not be changed in conference we would have a provision that would give us a different schedule, and whereas heretofore Army and Navy officers have received exactly the same pay for corresponding ranks, we would, under the new bills, have the rear-admirals drawing $1,000 per annum more than the corresponding rank in the Army as to the first class, and as to such of the rear-admirals, second class, as correspond to our brigadiers and now get 6,000, they would get $1,200 more than Army brigadier-generals, and those now getting $5,500 would get $600 more than Army brigadier-generals, and the colonels and lieutenant-colonels in proportion.

I wish to ask the Senator whether it is his expectation that he will be able to correct this in the conference which will naturally follow the passage of this bill for the Navy?

Mr. HALE. Yes, Mr. President; I apprehend that the conferees on the part of the Senate will have trouble enough in getting not only this proposition through, but any proposition increasing the pay of the Navy. If one branch is increased, the other ought to be increased.

Mr. WARREN. That is very true.

Mr. HALE. After the bill goes to conference I shall not seek to push action in the conference until I see what is done with the Army, and I shall try to put the two as near as I can upon something near an equal basis. But I am afraid the conferees will have trouble enough in getting it put in. I do not know how much trouble the Senator will have with the other branch.

Mr. WARREN. I want to ask the Senator another question. In view of the fact that for many years the pay has been the same in the Army and the Navy for corresponding rank, I ask the Senator if it is his intention to change that comity between the two bodies?

Mr. HALE. It has always been claimed by the Navy that their pay should be rather more than that of the Army, because it is service that calls them away from home, and there are more hardships and more expenses. We have observed that in the provisions for the rank and file for the seamen of the Navy. If the two bills go through, the enlisted men and petty officers in the Navy will receive some 10 or 15 per cent more than the Army, for the reason I have indicated. Whether that applies with the same force to the higher rank of officers I can not yet tell, but my mind is entirely open with regard to it. Considering this general proposition, I think the two services ought to be on as near the same basis as is possible, and I shall try to bring that about.

Mr. WARREN. I thank the Senator for his frankness. I want to say further—and I ask the attention of the Senate because this is a question that there may be a hereafter to—as a matter of fact the rank and file, the enlisted force of the Navy, has been receiving very much higher pay than we in the Senate, or, I take it, the lawmakers at the other end of the Capitol or the public generally, have understood, because we have always had in mind the Regular Army pay schedule. Of course that pay has been regulated from time to time by the Chief Executive of the nation, and it has been raised to a point which I have understood has been entirely satisfactory to the rank and file of the Navy. It amounted on an average to very nearly double what the average of the enlisted force of the Army received.

I am perfectly well aware, however, that when we raise the pay of the officers of the Navy and the officers and enlisted men of the Army, the enlisted men of the Navy will expect some notice. Although they would have been considerably higher without this addition of 10 per cent than what we propose to raise the rank and file of the Army to, I am not going to make objection to it. I realize the position the Senator and his committee are in. I assume there will have to be some percentage allowed all along.

But now, as to the question of the pay of the officers, it is true that on a cruise the officers are away from home, but I beg the Senate to remember that as to the Army, with a part of it in Cuba, part in Porto Rico, part in Panama, and other parts in the Philippines and up in Alaska and in Hawaii, the case is very different with Army officers than it formerly was.

Mr. HALE. Let me see. Do not officers in the Army have extra pay when in service in the Philippines?

Mr. WARREN. Ten per cent.

Mr. HALE. That they already have?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. HALE. And in Cuba?

Mr. WARREN. In Cuba 10 per cent. I am asking for information because I am not certain. Is there a difference in the pay of officers of the Navy as to sea pay and shore pay, for foreign service or home service?

Mr. HALE. No; it has been abolished.

Mr. WARREN. All that has been abolished?

Mr. HALE. The Army has 10 per cent?

Mr. WARREN. The Army has for officers 10 per cent in foreign service and the men have 20 per cent, but not in Hawaii or in Porto Rico, and not under the proposed new schedule.

I want to see the matter settled, as I know the Senator does, in a satisfactory way. I know that the officers of the Army and those who desire to see them have justice will not be satisfied if in this raise an admiral in the Navy, corresponding to the rank of a major-general in the Army, receives three times as much of a raise as the officer in the Army, and thereby receives $9,000, while the corresponding officer in the Army receives $8,000.

I take it, moreover, that the Senator expects that he will have control of the matter in conference, so that there may be a matter of equity between the two services, because I shall be called upon, as other Senators will, if there should be too great a difference, not to reduce the Navy afterwards, but to bring the Army up to it. I do not want to go into that kind of extravagance. I think we ought to reduce, and will have to reduce, in order to have satisfaction, the allowance that the bill now proposes for the officers of the Navy of the higher grades. But I am perfectly willing that it shall go into conference, upon the assurance of the Senator from Maine.

I should have said, when speaking on this raise of pay proposed for the officers, that I observed in this bill a very substantial raise, and I think a deserved one, for cadets at the Naval Academy. I want to say, for the information of the Senator from Maine, that so far we have received very little encouragement in our conference on the Army appropriation bill that we will be able to raise the pay at all or in any substantial way for cadets of the Military Academy. I want to call the Senator's attention to another thing which seems to trouble the conferees when we meet. It is the raise of pay for high officers of the retired force, for if we raise the rate too high at this time, for instance, in this pay, we will say $1,500 for a rear-admiral, of course, it raises three-fourths of that sum for every rear-admiral on the retired list.

As the Senator knows, and as we all know, there is a very large retired list at the present time of rear-admirals of the Navy and of brigadier-generals of the Army, on account of the personnel act in the one case and on account of the Spanish war and the retirement of a great many of the veterans in the other. Hence, in raising this pay it amounts to but little to raise the pay of nine admirals of the first class and nine of the second; but when you come to the hundreds of those retired, it does make a large sum.

It is the same in the Army. We have six major-generals and it is a small matter of $500 or $1,000 or $1,500 to each one. It is hardly worth talking about; but when you come to apply three-fourths of that amount to each one of 200 or 300 retired generals, it does make a very considerable sum. While I feel liberally inclined to both the Army and the Navy, I should prefer that we now make the mark too low in raising their pay rather than too high, for I apprehend it would be termed very ungracious in us individually or as a body if we sought to reduce the pay of the Army or Navy at any time.

So I hope that all these matters will be considered in the naval appropriation bill conference, as we are compelled to consider them, it seems, from the stout resistance on the House side, in the Army appropriation bill conference.

Mr. HALE. On page 3, line 17, I wish to perfect the amendment. I send the amendment to the amendment to the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, line 17, in the committee amendment, after the word "constructors," insert "assistant naval constructors."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next amendment passed over will be stated.

Mr. HALE. It is on page 13.

The SECRETARY. On page 13, beginning on line 13, the Committee on Naval Affairs reported to insert the following:

> Officers in the various staff corps of the Navy shall hereafter have actual rank and title as now established for the staff corps of the Army. Such officers of the staff corps of the Navy shall at all times have the title and designation of their rank, and new commissions in accordance therewith shall be forthwith issued to them: Provided, That this provision shall in no case carry with it command over any vessel of the Navy Department, but such command shall be exercised only by line officers.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. Let me perfect the amendment before the point is made. In line 17, after the word "rank," I move to insert the words "in the Navy."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the committee amendment, on page 13, line 17, after the word "rank," insert the words "in the Navy," so that it will read:

> Such officers of the staff corps of the Navy shall at all times have the title and designation of their rank in the Navy, and new commissions in accordance therewith shall be forthwith issued to them.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am in very hearty accord with the proviso of this amendment, but I am strongly opposed to the body of the amendment itself and always have been. I do not wish, however, to consume the time of the Senate in a debate on the merits of the amendment, and so I make the point of order that it is new legislation.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I make points of order myself too often not to recognize their weight when made by other Senators. I regret very much that the Senator feels constrained to make the point of order. Here is an opportunity—I can say only a few words—to end an embarrassing and I may say almost distressing condition in the Navy between the line and the staff corps, the question of recognized rank, not relative, but absolute rank. The staff officers feel that they ought to have what the Army staff officers have, what General Ainsworth says has worked well in the Army, that the quartermasters, paymasters, and all the other corps having actual rank, being generals, colonels, and so recognized, it has not only done no harm but has put an end to all the old jealousies. The committee reported this provision with a view of getting the same condition in the Navy that exists in the Army, so that after years of jealousy and heart-burning, which has never ceased and will not without something of this kind, we should have a harmonious condition.

I regret it all the more because the two propositions go together, because it is a part of this amendment that while the Staff shall have actual rank and recognition and title they must be satisfied with that and must never have military command upon any ship.

That question, as Senators know, became very acute about the early part of the present session. It is a thing that ought to be settled, but it has got to be settled, as the President has said, by law, because he has taken certain ground under existing law which has been carried out and is believed to be within the range of existing law.

If we can get this whole provision put on, it settles all those questions. The Staff will hereafter get not only relative but actual title, but they will have no command over any ship—hospital ship or any other. All that will be left with the line officers of the Navy.

I had hoped that no Senator would make this point of order. I understand the Senator has not made it in any captious way, and that there are a great many officers of the Navy who do not believe, on the one side, in the first part of it, giving rank, and others who do not believe in taking away command from the Staff. Therefore I have no reason in any way to find fault with any Senator, as much as I may regret it, for making the point of order..

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Massachusetts to make the point of order that the amendment proposes new legislation?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; new and general legislation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment proposes general legislation, and therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I will not again go over what I said yesterday, but I will call attention to simply one of the items on page 60, and I ask the attention of the Senator from Maine, because it relates to the amendment adopted by the Senate. As I said, I will not go over the different battle ships that I discussed yesterday, but I simply want to call his attention to just one ship, the item in lines 15 and 16, for repairing the Maine, $562,500.

I sent to the Committee on Naval Affairs and the committee has sent to me the last estimate of the Navy Department, and I will read it:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 31, 1908.

SIR: Referring to the letter of this Department of the 11th ultimo, forwarding, pursuant to the provision contained in the naval appropriation act approved March 2, 1907, under the caption "Bureau of Construction and Repair," subhead "Construction and repair of vessels," a list of vessels requiring general overhacling to the extent of $200,000 or more during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, or repairs during the same period, which in the aggregate under all bureaus will probably exceed 20 per cent of the total value of each of said vessels, I have the honor to request that the name of the U. S. S. Maine be added to the above-mentioned list, as that vessel will require new boilers, general overhauling, and repairs to machinery installed, at a total cost of more than $200,000.

Very respectfully, TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY,
Acting Secretary.

The PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES SENATE.

I should like to ask the Senator from Maine if on March 31 the Navy Department sent an estimate to the Senate that the total cost of repairs on the Maine would be $200,000, how can we be justified in inserting $560,000? This is the document that the Senator referred me to, and I have not been able to secure any other information showing me why the appropriation ought to be made $560,000 instead of $200,000. If the Senator has any other information, I would be glad to have him give it to me.

Mr. HALE. There are one or two letters. This estimate was made March 31, 1908. In the letter of April 20, which the committee acted upon, the Department recommends that—

There should be inserted after "dollars," on page 54, line 20, the following:

The House did not insert the provision in the bill—

"The Maine, $657,500;" and the words "88 cents," same line, should be omitted.

The total, in lines 21 and 22 of page 54, should therefore be corrected to agree with the above detail figures, and should read "$6,245,800."

The estimate for overhauling of the Maine is submitted at this time in view of the recently developed necessity for reboilering that vessel, making it advisable to undertake a general overhauling in all departments, this vessel having been continuously in commission for more than five years.

This shows we all miscalculate in reckoning the past. I said yesterday that I thought it was three or four years, but the Maine is five years old.

On April 20 the Department sent a letter on this subject, which I shall ask the Secretary to read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR,
Washington, D. C., April 20, 1908.

[Subject A—Maine—Repairs in excess of $200,000.]

SIR: 1. Referring to the Department's memorandum of the 18th instant, relative to the submission of estimates for contemplated alterations on the Maine, the Bureau submits an estimate of $300,000 for this purpose.

2. The Maine has been continuously in commission for over five years and would shortly require a general overhauling in any event. In view of the understanding that the renewal of her boilers is necessary, it is deemed best that this general overhauling be undertaken so that it may proceed concurrently with the work on the boilers. As the present boilers are of the water-tube type and capable of being removed without serious disturbance of the decks and bulkheads, and as the vessel has not been in service quite so long as the battle ships mentioned in the Bureau's letter of January 11, 1908, No. 2182–A.21, the necessary work on the Maine will be less expensive than on the other vessels referred to. It will, however, be of the same general character, consisting of making changes in battery and magazines to bring them into accord with present practice; installing ammunition hoists and other turret fittings in accordance with present requirements; reducing the top hamper; installing fire-control towers, and making general repairs and such miscellaneous alterations as may be practicable at moderate cost.

3. The expenditures on the Maine for the above-mentioned work during the fiscal year 1909 can be paid for from the Bureau's regular appropriation for that year, hence no special appropriation for this work will be necessary.

Very respectfully, W. L. CAPPS,
Chief Constructor, United States Navy, Chief of Bureau.

The SECRETARY OF THE NAVY.

Mr. CLAY. Then, as I understand, the Secretary of the Navy, on March 31, 1908, addressed a letter to the President of the United States, stating that the total cost of boilers and general overhauling and repairs on the Maine would be $200,000.

Mr. HALE. Did that include the boilers?

Mr. CLAY. This report that I have here of March 31, 1908, says "boilers." I have read it just exactly as it is. On March 31, 1908—I will read it again—it is stated:

I have the honor to request that the name of the U. S. S. Maine be added to the above-mentioned list, as that vessel will require new boilers, general overhauling, and repairs to machinery installed, at a total cost of more than $200,000.

Now, Mr. President, in twenty days we have another letter from the Navy Department saying that it will cost $650,000. We have a great Department of this Government, spending a hundred million dollars every year, on the 21st day of March telling the President of the United States that it will cost $200,000 for boilers and general repairs on the Maine, and in twenty days thereafter another letter comes here saying that it will cost $650,000. It is not only serious—the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] says it is serious—but it is not explained. It is indefensible—absolutely indefensible. Why, Mr. President, if you take the estimates read by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] from other Departments of the Government, you will find for general repairing from one Department the estimate is $350,000; and when you go to another Department you find it is $150,000 for repairing; but the total cost of repairing the Maine on the 31st day of March, 1908, was put at $200,000.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CLAY. Yes.

Mr. CULBERSON. I wish to ask the Senator a question for information.

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator from Georgia appears to be reading from a letter to the President from the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. CLAY. Yes.

Mr. CULBERSON. The letter which has been read by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] appears to be from a chief of one of the bureaus of the Navy Department. Have we any information that the Secretary of the Navy himself has changed his opinion since writing the letter to which the Senator from Georgia has referred?

Mr. CLAY. I can not answer that question. Probably the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] can answer it.

Mr. HALE. The estimate is made by the head of the bureau and is transmitted by the Secretary. That is the custom.

Mr. CULBERSON. The letter, however, appears to be signed by the chief of one of the bureaus. Is that the method of transmitting it?

Mr. HALE. In making up the accounts the estimate is generally made by the chief of the bureau; and then the Department adopts that, and transmits it, as it did in this case, from the Department.

Mr. CULBERSON. With the permission of the Senator from Georgia, I will ask the Senator from Maine if he has any information that the Secretary of the Navy has changed his personal opinion since writing the letter to the President?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have not a particle of information except what is derived from these letters.

Mr. CLAY. Again, with the Senator's permission——

Mr. HALE. I can say nothing more than has been disclosed by the letters that I have last had read. I can add no new information. If the Senate does not believe that this amount should be so large, let it reduce it.

Mr. CLAY. I am not criticising the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. I know the Senator is not.

Mr. CLAY. But, Mr. President, we have to act largely on——

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CLAY. With pleasure.

Mr. FORAKER. I simply want to ask for information, how long has the Maine been in commission?

Mr. CLAY. I think it was commissioned in 1902.

Mr. FORAKER. Has it ever been repaired before? Have we had to make any appropriations heretofore for that purpose?

Mr. CLAY. It is my understanding that the Navy Department insists that these ships are repaired every year. I think the rule adopted, or at least I have been so informed, is that it spends about 5 per cent a year on them.

Mr. FORAKER. I want to know whether this necessity for repair was caused by some accident or whether it is merely wear and tear.

Mr. CLAY. It is the natural wear and tear, according to my understanding. I have not heard of any accident.

Mr. FORAKER. And I want to know whether these ships deteriorate at this rate annually or whether this was for the whole period of five years. I just want to get some idea as to the durability of these ships.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator from Georgia will allow me——

Mr. CLAY. Yes.

Mr. HALE. Previous to the enactment of the provision directing specific estimates for large repairs to be made and appropriations in detail accordingly, nobody knew, I will say to the Senator from Ohio, what small repairs were put upon a ship. We gave the different bureaus of the Department a gross sum. They went on and kept the ships in shape. Under that system evils grew up, so that we found, as was stated in the other House, that they were practically reconstructing the ships without us knowing anything about it. So we provided that they should send in, whenever the repairs amounted to anything like $200,000, estimates as to the amount, and the appropriation should be made and based upon them in detail. Hereafter there will be no large repairs made for any ship excepting on report and indorsement by Congress.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CLAY. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I want to ask the Senator from Georgia what he means by his statement that the expenditure amounts to about 5 per cent a year? My understanding is that it costs about 5 per cent in the ordinary running repairs of a battle ship, but that once in five or eight years there has to be a renewal of the boilers and other machinery, which brings the total up, in the run of the life of a ship, nearer to 10 per cent. That is to say, we do not get, on an average, more than ten years' service of a ship—that is, a first-class ship, although it might be rated a second or third class ship and last a while longer after the first ten years.

Mr. CLAY. I may not be correctly informed, but I have been informed that the life of a ship is twenty years, and that the cost of repairing a ship for that time is about equal to the original cost of a ship.

The Senator from Maine is correct. We acted wisely, in my opinion, when we amended a previous naval appropriation bill and put in a provision requiring the Navy Department to send to us annually a list of the ships to be repaired and the amount of money to be expended on each ship. The object and purpose of that law was that the Congress might know what repairs were needed each year on a ship and how much our naval establishment costs; but when I read the report following that law I was amazed. Take the different bureaus of the Navy Department and the estimates made in each bureau for general overhauling; take one bureau, and for general overhauling they need so much; take another bureau, and for general overhauling they require so much. I believe in specific appropriations. I believe if the Navy Department intends to expend $300,000 on a ship it ought to say how that money is to be expended. Congress ought to be in close touch with the items contained in appropriation bills.

I do not believe that any Senator can justify the discrepancies in the letter read by the Senator from Maine and the letter that I have just read from the Secretary of the Navy. I do not desire to unjustly criticise the Secretary of the Navy. The maintenance of a navy necessary to defend this country is not a party question; it is a question in which every patriotic citizen is equally and vitally interested; but when you come to the question of expending $500,000 on a ship, how do you know what repairs it needs, except from the Navy Department? How do I know how to cast my vote for an item of $200,000 or $300,000 unless I can rely upon the recommendations and estimates made by the Navy Department?

Mr. President, I again say that here is a recommendation, an estimate of $200,000, on March 30, 1908. There was nothing asked for the repair of this ship in the other House, and the Navy Department sent nothing to the Senate or the Senate committee in regard to this ship until the identical day this bill came from the Committee on Naval Affairs, if I remember correctly.

Mr. HALE. I see the force of the position of the Senator. I do not myself wholly recognize the reason for these apparent discrepancies. Perhaps it is because both the Senator and I are dull in the matter and do not see. But it has occurred to me that this is an amendment to a House provision and will go to conference; and whether it goes in as it is or is amended, I shall ask the Secretary of the Navy to explain fully the reason why it is they want $560,000 for the Maine. I suppose it will result in their showing—which I do not think they have yet done—more in detail why this money is needed, and I think they ought to show it. I am indifferent as to whether this item remains as reported by the committee or is reduced, for it will all come up in conference. If the Senator wants to cut it down to the figures stated in one of the letters—no, I do not think that would do, because it would not raise the question in conference. I think the safer way, perhaps, is to leave it, with the understanding that a full explanation will be required, and I shall be glad to state to the Senator before any conference report is brought in what the explanation is. We shall not agree and, I presume, the House will not agree—we will have trouble enough there—unless the whole matter is cleared up.

Mr. CLAY. The statement of the Senator is a very fair one. The Senator is always fair—I have found him to be so, but I am sure the Senator has not sufficient information to satisfy himself in regard to this amendment, and I believe I will move to strike out "$562,500," and insert "$200,000," in accordance with the estimate, without any further remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 60, lines 15 and 16, it is proposed to strike out "$562,500," and insert "$200,000."

Mr. HALE. I think the other way, Mr. President, would be a safer way—to leave it as it is, because, if you fix an entirely inadequate amount, the conference committee can not raise it. We have very strict rules in that regard. We can get up to the highest figures put in by either House, but we can not go beyond that.

Mr. CLAY. I ask the Senator is not the Maine with the fleet now?

Mr. HALE. Oh, I was going to say half of these vessels are with the fleet.

Mr. CLAY. My understanding is that the vessels for which the largest repairs are provided are now with the fleet, and will not probably return to this country for some time.

Mr. HALE. Many of them are.

Mr. CLAY. Does the Senator think that we can utilize this money on repairing these vessels while they are absent?

Mr. HALE. I suppose some of it can be utilized, but not much, I should think.

Mr. CLAY. I should not think much of it could be so used.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I will not make any point on the amendment. Let it go. No great harm can come from it.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Maine if he expects to get a vote on this bill this evening? If not, I want to suggest that, if we are to make any appropriation at all, I think we should make what is necessary. An appropriation of $200,000 if $600,000 is really needed would be a vain thing. By morning we could be advised by the Secretary of the Navy whether there was some mistake about what has been sent to us. There must be some mistake. Somebody has been under a misapprehension. I would rather vote to strike it all out than to reduce it to something that would do no good.

Mr. HALE. I was induced to consent by the other consideration, that really I do not see how any of this money can be expended before next December, when we will have another session of Congress.

Mr. FORAKER. We have shipyards on the Pacific coast, have we not?

Mr. HALE. Not competent to make any extensive repairs.

Mr. PERKINS. With the permission of the Senator, I will say that we have in San Francisco the best navy-yard outside of New York.

Mr. FORAKER. I thought perhaps they had sent these ships around there to be repaired.

Mr. PERKINS. I will further state, Mr. President, that if the ships are to be reboilered, the work can go on while the ships are absent. It will take six months or more; but still I agree with the Senator from Maine that it would do no great harm to accept this amendment.

Mr. FORAKER. Do I understand the Senator from California to state that they can put new boilers in the ships while on this cruise?

Mr. PERKINS. While they are in the harbor of San Francisco, Mr. President, we can take excellent care of them.

Mr. FORAKER. Of course if we are going to vote on the bill this afternoon, I will not make the suggestion; but if we are going to let it go over until to-morrow, the Navy Department might be heard from further.

Mr. HALE. I had hoped, Mr. President, that we might finish the bill to-day.

Mr. FORAKER. I withdraw the suggestion I made.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the committee will be regarded as open. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I now offer one or two formal amendments, and then I am through.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 70, line 3, after the word "thousand," it is proposed to strike out "two" and insert "four."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary stated the next amendment submitted by Mr. HALE, which was on page 70, line 4, after the word "hundred," to insert the words "and forty," so as to read:

One thousand four hundred and forty dollars.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary stated the next amendment submitted by Mr. HALE, which was on page 70, line 4, after the word "thousand," to insert "two hundred."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary stated the next amendment submitted by Mr. HALE, which was, on page 71, line 23, after the word "all," to strike out "$145,108.26," and to insert "$145,548.26."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary stated the next amendment submitted by Mr. HALE, which was, on page 75, in lines 11, 12, and 13, to strike out "$475,728.36," and to insert "$487,028.36."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DICK and Mr. HEYBURN addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. DICK] reserved an amendment.

Mr. DICK. But I yield for the present to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN].

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, on page 3, I move to amend the committee amendment, in line 16, after the word "of," where it first occurs, by inserting the word "chaplains."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs, on page 3, after line 6, relating to the pay of the Navy, will be considered as open. The Senator from Idaho proposes an amendment to the amendment of the committee, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the amendment of the committee, on page 3, line 16, before the word "professors," it is proposed to insert "chaplains."

Mr. HEYBURN. In enumerating the officers to be equalized the chaplains were omitted, and they seem to be the only officers who are omitted. There are only twenty-four of them, I believe, in the Navy. The amendment does not increase the appropriation, but merely includes all of the officers that were intended to be included within the class.

Mr. HALE. The reason the chaplains were omitted is that only a short time ago we took up, adjusted, and increased the pay of the chaplains, and put them up beyond, as the complaint at the time was, other staff officers. They, having the advantage and benefit of that, were not put in this provision; but the chaplains, I will say to the Senator, in addition to that, will get the 20 per cent increase which is provided in this bill, the same as if they had not been put up; but they ought not to be put on any different plane.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have been advised upon some inquiry that this will not advance them, but only equalize them, and that they are not now on an equal basis in estimating or determining their compensation.

Mr. HALE. Of course, no one grade is on an equality with the others, but we advance them generally.

Mr. HEYBURN. They hold a uniform rank.

Mr. HALE. They hold, like all staff officers, a relative rank.

Mr. HEYBURN. A relative rank.

Mr. HALE. I may say positive rank, without title and designation.

Mr. HEYBURN. This amendment would simply give them pay in accordance with the rank which they hold, which is what was done with the other officers.

Mr. HALE. No; this part of the amendment only applies to certain corps that were not put up and are not on an equality with other corps. The chaplains' corps is not one of that kind, because it is on an equality with other staff corps, and they were not included in this provision, because they are not at present discriminated against as the corps of naval constructors and civil engineers are. That is why we put them in.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine whether professors of mathematics are not exactly in the same position?

Mr. HALE. No; they are not, because we have never put them up.

Mr. HEYBURN. How about naval constructors and civil engineers?

Mr. HALE. Naval constructors more than any others have been discriminated against.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish to ask the Senator when the chaplains were advanced in pay?

Mr. HALE. Their pay was adjusted and increased in the act that was passed in 1906.

Mr. WARREN. Are the chaplains in the Navy commissioned the same as they are in the Army, with the right of retirement, and so forth?

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. WARREN. If so, the percentage applies to them.

Mr. HALE. The percentage applies to them. They will get the 20 per cent increase.

Mr. WARREN. They have the rank, I suppose, of captains?

Mr. HALE. We gave them what they asked for two years ago.

Mr. WARREN. If they take the same grade as do the chaplains in the Army, by an act respecting chaplains of the Army passed a few years ago, after being in a certain length of time part of them become majors.

Mr. HALE. They can only go up to a certain grade. They can not reach the higher grades.

Mr. WARREN. But they are regularly commissioned officers, and they get the pay of their rank.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN].

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the Senator from Ohio [Mr. DICK] desires to make some remarks in regard to it.

Mr. DICK. Mr. President, I have an amendment or two which I desire to offer on the pay provision when the amendment which the Senator from Idaho has offered has been voted on. I am entirely favorable to the proposition of the Senator from Idaho. I see no good reason why the chaplains should not stand upon practically the same basis as other officers.

It is true that we passed legislation looking to equalizing it, but now that we are aiming again to equalize the pay and rank of officers of the Navy, I see no good reason why the chaplains should not be included in the general proposition.

When this motion is disposed of I have two more amendments I should like to present.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator from Ohio contend that line 7 does not raise the pay of chaplains? I am under the impression that chaplains are raised by the language in line 7, "pay of all commissioned officers."

Mr. DICK. Not at all. I think their pay is increased by this amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Yes; I thought so. As commissioned officers.

Mr. DICK. Yes, sir.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 3 in the committee amendment, line 16, before the word "professors," insert the word "chaplains."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. DICK. I offer an amendment to be inserted on page 3, line 24.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, after line 24, on page 3, the following:

That hereafter immediately upon official notification of the death from wounds or disease contracted in line of duty of any officer or enlisted man on the active list of the Navy the Paymaster-General of the Navy shall cause to be paid to the widow of such officer or enlisted man, or any person previously designated by him, an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate received by such officer or enlisted man at the date of his death, less $75 in the case of an officer and $35 in the case of an enlisted man, to defray expenses of interment, and the residue, if any, of the amount reserved shall be paid subsequently to the designated person. The Secretary of the Navy shall establish regulations requiring each officer and enlisted man to designate the proper person to whom this amount shall be paid in case of death, and said amount shall be paid to that person from funds appropriated for the pay of the Navy.

Mr. HALE. I do not know how I would vote if that was submitted as a general bill, but it clearly has no place in an appropriation bill, and I make the point of order on it.

Mr. DICK. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. I withhold the point of order if the Senator from Ohio wishes to speak.

Mr. DICK. My reason for submitting the amendment at this time is to provide for the officers of the Navy as we did provide for the officers of the Army in the Army appropriation bill, to which no objection was made and which is now in conference. We will there provide, in accordance with the provisions of that amendment, for the officers of the Army and Marine Corps and the Revenue-Cutter Service and for the enlisted men of the Army, and this provision is for the purpose of giving the same privileges to the Navy that we have already practically accorded without opposition to the Army.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. DICK. I do.

Mr. HALE. Has the Senator looked carefully into that, and is he certain that this is no more for the Navy than has been passed by the Senate upon the appropriation bill for the Army?

Mr. DICK. That is true.

Mr. WARREN. Matter similar to that which the Senator from Ohio alludes to was put in on the floor on the Army pay bill, which passed here as a separate measure, and because of that it was included in the appropriation bill. I will say, while I am on my feet, although I have not looked into it closely, that I believe it is surplusage to mention the Marine Corps in the amendment, because it is provided for in the Army measure.

Mr. HALE. It is, undoubtedly.

Mr. DICK. It is.

Mr. WARREN. So it should not be included in this amendment.

Mr. DICK. It ought to be stricken out.

Mr. HALE. I will withdraw the point of order under the circumstances, but I think the Senator had better strike out the Marine Corps.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. DICK. If it is included in the Army bill, I shall be very glad to have it stricken out.

Mr. WARREN. I was speaking without having the language before me, but I understand the Senator from Ohio has copied exactly the Army measure, only applying it to the Navy.

Mr. DICK. I have.

Mr. WARREN. With the same amounts—$75 and $35 for burial, and so forth.

Mr. DICK. Yes, sir.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DICK. I offer an amendment which makes like provision for retired officers of the Navy, they being the only ones excepted under the present law.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment just adopted it is proposed to insert:

That when an officer has been thirty years in the service, he may, upon his own application, in the discretion of the President, be retired from active service and placed upon the retired list. When an officer has served forty consecutive years as a commissioned officer he shall, if he makes application therefor to the President, be retired from active service and placed upon the retired list. And any officer of the Navy who is now serving or who shall hereafter serve as chief of a bureau of the Navy Department and shall subsequently be retired, shall be retired with the rank, pay, and allowances authorized by law for the retirement of such bureau chief.

Mr. CULBERSON. I make the point of order on the amendment that it proposes general legislation.

Mr. HALE. It does, undoubtedly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The provisions of the proposed amendment are clearly general legislation. Therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HALE. What does the Senator from Ohio want done with the band amendment?

Mr. DICK. I now offer an amendment to that amendment.

Mr. HALE. It is reported in the bill on page 72, and the Senator reserved it.

Mr. DICK. Yes. I have an amendment which I desire to offer.

The SECRETARY. On page 72, after line 19, it is proposed to insert the following:

That the Naval Academy band shall consist of one leader, who shall have the rank, pay, and allowance of a second lieutenant in the Marine Corps; one second leader, with pay at the rate of $50 per month; twenty-nine musicians, first class, and eleven musicians, second class; and shall be paid from pay of the Navy.

That the members of the Naval Academy band as now organized shall be enlisted in the Navy and credited with all prior service of whatever nature as members of said band, as shown by the records of the Naval Academy and the pay rolls of the ships and academy; and the said leader and the enlisted musicians of the band shall be entitled to the same benefits in respect to pay, emoluments, and retirement arising from longevity, reenlistment, and length of service as are, or may hereafter become, applicable to other enlisted men of the Navy.

Mr. CULBERSON. That is a very long amendment. I could not catch all of it. I make the point of order that some of it at least is general legislation, and obnoxious to the rule.

Mr. HALE. It is clearly general legislation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has examined the proposed amendment, and is of the opinion that it proposes general legislation, and is obnoxious to the rule. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment passed over, contained in lines 21 to 24, on page 72.

Mr. HALE. That has not been acted upon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is agreed to.

Mr. NELSON. I offer an amendment to come in at the end of line 12, on page 13. I think it comes very appropriately after that paragraph of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 13, after line 12, it is proposed to insert:

That the use of irons, single or double, as a form of punishment in the Navy of the United States, whether imposed by a naval commander or the judgment of a summary court or court-martial, is hereby abolished.

Mr. NELSON. In support of the amendment I ask to have certain communications read. Let the longer letter be first read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the letter.

Mr. NELSON. I will ask that the letters be inserted in the RECORD, and let us take a vote on the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letters will be printed in the RECORD.

The letters referred to are as follows:

LA CROSSE, WIS., March 2, 1908.

Hon. KNUTE NELSON, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed find a clipping that will give you an idea of my personal petition to you.

In November, 1906, I had occasion to visit my son, who was then an enlisted seaman in the United States naval service. From the time of his enlistment in 1903 I became very much interested in the welfare of the "blue jackets." His ship lying in Boston at the time gave me an opportunity of visiting several other vessels lying in the harbor and the hospital at Chelsea, Charlestown, Mass. The need of the abolishment of the use of irons from the United States Navy had already impressed me, but I assure you when I found boys sick on their cots with feet in shackles I thought it an imperative duty to report the same at Washington. Upon leaving Boston I also visited the Brooklyn naval yards where I again became conscious of the fact that the use of irons bore evidence of untold cruelty, witnessing men shackled hands and feet hobbling over the rough cobblestones of the naval yards. I was fortunate in meeting the Secretary of the Navy, General Bonaparte, since Attorney-General, to whom I explained the condition of affairs. He became greatly interested, urging me to remain another day and he would give me still more time to look up the matter. The rigid rules as to enlisted men making reports while in the service caused me to fear that I should implicate my son, who still had five months left to serve, and therefore I thought best to leave. General Bonaparte, however, gave me this advice: That I go home and interest the Congressman of our district in the matter, and then use my personal influence. As a busy house mother, having raised a large family, I have had little or no occasion for gaining influence. Mr. ESCH, our Congressman, took up the matter with great interest and energy, giving me courage to exert myself to the utmost to help on the cause. The bill is now before Congress, and my plea to you is that, for the sake of the mothers of the "blue jackets," that you will influence the Congressmen of your district to aid in the passing of House bill 15658, to abolish the use of irons in the United States Navy.

My sister, Mrs. Henrietta C. Olberg, of Minneapolis, referred me to you, as she knew you would be interested in anything that pertained to the welfare of humanity.

Respectfully, yours,

MRS. EMMA P. OLBERG,
1615 Ferry street, La Crosse, Wis.

[From Army and Navy Register of March 7, 1908.]

Senator NELSON yesterday submitted an amendment to the naval appropriation bill which provides: "That the use of irons, single or double, as a form of punishment in the Navy of the United States, whether imposed by a naval commander or the judgment of a court-martial, is hereby abolished."

SENATOR NELSON: It is refreshing to the "white and free-born" American to read the above humane provision.

Such brutal and degrading punishment was abolished in the Army long ago along with that relic of barbarism, previously abolished by law, of "flogging on the bare back." The result of the abolition in both cases was most beneficial to the service.

It cuts the heart out of the average decent and self-respecting American soldier, marine, or sailor to be manacled and shackled like a galley slave, at the caprice of those in brief authority, as a punishment for some slight offense.

No wonder the good American fathers and mothers lament the enlistment of their sons, to be subjected to such degrading humiliation!

May success attend your patriotic efforts to right this burning shame—pro bono publico.

AMERICAN CITIZEN.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to offer an amendment. On page 61, after the words "cents," in line 1, I move to insert:

For repair of the steamship Enterprise, $44,500.

It is the training ship.

Mr. HALE. I feel I must make the point of order that this is not a matter which has been estimated for.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LODGE. I offer an amendment to come in as a new section at the end of the bill.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill, as a new section, the following:

That after June 30, 1908, all persons engaged in clerical work, including draftsmen, employed at United States navy-yards, gun factories, and naval stations, whose compensation is based on a per diem, monthly, or yearly rate, shall be granted thirty working days' leave of absence in each year, without forfeiture of pay during such leave: Provided, That it shall be lawful to allow pro rata leave only to those serving twelve consecutive months or more: And provided further, That in all cases the heads of divisions shall have discretion as to the time when the leave can best be allowed without detriment to the service, and that absence on account of sickness shall be deducted from the leave hereby granted.

Mr. HALE. I do not think this is a proper place to consider that new legislation, and I make the point of order that it is general legislation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is clearly obnoxious to the rule which prohibits the acceptance on appropriation bills of amendments proposing general legislation, and therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. BURKETT. I desire to offer an amendment on page 35.

The SECRETARY. On page 35, after the word "dollars," in line 5, it is proposed to insert:

For addition to brass and iron foundry, the total cost not to exceed $300,000, $100,000.

Mr. HALE. That is a matter which came up in the House and was rejected there. I must make the point of order that it is an additional appropriation, for a new subject, and is not recommended by the committee or estimated for by the Department. The Department, I find, has requested it.

Mr. BURKETT. I understood the Senator from Maine to say that this is not recommended by the Department. It is in the Book of Estimates, I will say to the Senator, on page 249, and it is also recommended and recommended very strongly. The Department has been very anxious about this matter for a number of years. It is not only a question of economy, the Department says, but a question of humanity, and the Department has put it up to Congress year after year as one of the things which ought to be done for the sake of the men and for the sake of the decency of the yard, as well as a matter of economy. The Department says it will save a vast amount to the Government each year, and, moreover, that the foundry building where these men have to work is in such a dilapidated and unsanitary condition that, from the standpoint of simple respectability and decent treatment to the men we employ, the Department urges that this amendment should come in. It is not only in the Book of Estimates, but it is in the report of the Navy Department, and there is a considerable paragraph devoted to this special subject.

Mr. HALE. I stated that, on examining, I saw that the Department had estimated for it. There is no doubt about that. I stated before the Senator from Nebraska rose that I saw it was recommended by the Department.

Of course it is the erection of a new plant, not in any way authorized by law. The main thing that actuates me is the fact that it came up in the House and was fought out there and was thrown out. It gave rise—I suppose the Senator has read the debates in the House—to long debate, and was finally thrown out there. I do not suppose there is any likelihood that the House will change its action. But seeing that it is recommended by the Department, of course I do not make that as a point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine insist upon his point of order?

Mr. HALE. I find it has been estimated for, and so I do not propose to make that point.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I wish to say, in reply to the Senator from Maine, that the House never got to a vote on the question. There was a point of order raised there against the amendment, their rules being different from ours, and it went out on a point of order. While it was debated very slightly, and very slightly indeed, it went out on a point of order and no opportunity was ever given for a vote.

I want to read from the report——

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BURKETT. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator a question. I do not remember about it. I can not carry all these things in my mind. Was it reported by the Naval Committee of the House, and did it go out on a point of order?

Mr. BURKETT. I think not. No; it was introduced on the floor of the House.

Mr. HALE. It was moved on the floor?

Mr. BURKETT. Yes.

Mr. HALE. That was my recollection.

Mr. BURKETT. I want to read what the Secretary of the Navy says in speaking of this matter:

The present foundry is antiquated and entirely inadequate in size and unsuitable as a foundry for such an institution as the Naval Gun Factory. It is a menace to the health of the employees and the officers resident in the yard in its present situation. The loss to the Government every year by not having better facilities in this regard would soon equal the amount requested to properly provide for this portion of the Gun Factory, and its increased products would materially aid in the output of the armament from our shops, saving both in time and expense. It is the most needed of all improvements recommended, and it is urged that every effort be made to secure a suitable appropriation for the starting of this much-needed improvement. At present, in case of hostile emergency, the requirements of the Gun Factory could not be met, and the Government would be embarrassed by not having suitable facilities for getting out foundry work.

Mr. HALE. I read the discussion in the House. I think the Department makes out a pretty good case for the necessity of this amendment, and I shall make no further objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Maine to the fact that it will be necessary to increase the total, on page 35, in line 5.

Mr. HALE. Let the Secretary state it.

The SECRETARY. It should read "in all, $148,000."

Mr. HALE. Let that amendment be made.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PILES. On page 85, line 17, before the words "first-class battle ships," I move to strike out "two" and to insert in lieu thereof "four," so as to provide for four battle ships. I ask that the matter may go over until to-morrow. It is now too late to undertake to discuss it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 85, before the words "first-class battle ships," in line 17, strike out "two" and insert "four."

Mr. PILES. I ask that the matter may go over until to-morrow, as it is too late to discuss it to-night.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Washington asks that the amendment may lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. HALE. This is the only subject that is left, and I think it will give rise to some debate, although, unless I change my mind, I think I shall see no reason for consuming the time of the Senate upon a matter as to which I presume its mind is already made up. But other Senators feel differently about it, and two or three have suggested to me that as they desire to speak upon it and are not ready to-night, they prefer that it shall go over. We are always very liberal about making those arrangements.

I should like to ask if any Senator is now ready to go on who desires to debate the amendment which proposes four battle ships instead of two, as the committee has reported. If any Senator is ready, I shall be very glad, in the way of helping the bill along, to have him proceed.

Mr. FOSTER. I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. HALE. Let us get in the other amendments if we can.

Mr. FOSTER. I offer the amendment I send to the desk. I have submitted it to the chairman and the Senator from California.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 37, line 2, after the word "dollars," insert "improvements to river front, $25,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER. In order to have the total correspond, I move, in line 3, page 37, to strike out "31" and insert "56."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. I offer an amendment, to be inserted as a new section.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following:

That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint dental surgeons to serve the officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps, not to exceed thirty in all. Said dental surgeons shall be attached to the Medical Department of the Navy; shall have the rank and compensation of acting assistant surgeons in the Navy; shall be graduates of standard dental colleges, trained in the several branches of dentistry; within the age limits of 24 and 35 years; of good moral character and professional standing, and shall pass a physical and professional examination; and their appointments shall be for a term of years and revocable at the pleasure of the President: Provided, That the dentist now employed at the Naval Academy shall not be displaced by the operation of this act.

Mr. OVERMAN. I will say to the Senator from Maine that that is the provision of a bill introduced by him at the last session of Congress, and also the same provision that was in a bill recommended favorably by the House. I will not ask that the report of the House committee be read, but that it be placed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report will be inserted in the RECORD.

The report referred to is as follows:

[House Report No. 1227, Sixtieth Congress, first session.]

DENTAL SURGEONS FOR THE NAVY.

March 13, 1908.—Committed to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DAWSON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, submitted the following report to accompany H. R. 16620:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 16620) authorizing the appointment of dental surgeons in the Navy, report the same without amendment and recommend its passage.

This bill provides for the appointment of thirty dental surgeons with "rank and compensation of acting assistant surgeons." Their appointments are made for such term as the President may determine, are revocable at his pleasure, and do not carry the right of promotion nor age-retirement pay.

Similar bills were favorably reported by this committee February 3, 1905, and March 9, 1906. For seven years the Navy Department has recommended legislative authority for the appointment of dental surgeons and presented evidence that their service is imperatively required for humanitarian and economic reasons.

In a letter to Hon. GEORGE EDMUND FOSS, chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, under date of March 3, 1908, Hon. V. H. Metcalf, Secretary of the Navy, recommends the passage of this bill in the following words:

"Attention is invited to the bill (H. R. 16620) authorizing the appointment of dental surgeons in the Navy, the provisions of which are in line with the Department's views on the subject."

The urgent need of dental surgeons in the Navy is emphasized by the Surgeon-General of the Navy, in his annual report for 1907, in the following statement:

"Like the eyes, the teeth are coming properly to be regarded as intimately and widely associated with the various organs and functions of the body, and that defective teeth may be responsible for much ill health is recognized by all who keep in touch with the accumulating truths of medical science. The naval surgeon is alert to detect dental disorders early lest an aggravation of them produce grave illness. He, however, has not that special knowledge required to fit him to cope with diseased teeth in a final manner. He can and often does put in temporary fillings and treats the medical and surgical complications incident to dental disorders and often extracts such teeth as are not worth preserving, but naval surgeons are not expected to deal with dental disorders in a radical manner. The practice of dentistry requires a special education and training.

"The teeth and the mouth are indubitably important factors in the causation of certain diseases of bacterial origin. This is not a hypothetical conclusion, for it has been proven beyond doubt that not only are bacteria found in great numbers in uncared for and neglected mouths, but their disease-producing properties are greatly increased, particularly in and about decayed teeth. Much of the tonsilitis and pharyngitis in the Navy can undoubtedly be traced to bad teeth, as can also deranged digestion and general physical deterioration. In this connection it is not improbable that the teeth are an important contributory factor in tuberculosis by producing a state of lessened resistance to the disease by the constant absorption of poisonous matter.

"In thus indicating the prominent reasons for the Navy's need of proper dental services, it may be added that a bad tooth may occasionally give rise to serious complications, which may even endanger life.

"Surg. W. H. Bell, writing from Camp Elliott, on the Isthmus of Panama, says:

"'During February (1905) a problem presented which gave us considerable worry, as there appeared no immediate solution. It concerned some very necessary dental work which thirty-five or forty of the command required to have done. Quarantine was then in force against Panama on account of yellow fever, and that fact, therefore, excluded us from the possibility of sending our men there for dental services, and as there was no dentist in Colon or anywhere else along the line the problem became a difficult one. We tried in vain to persuade one or the other of the American dentists on the Isthmus to come to camp with his outfit, and the only other resort was a native dentist, whose work, as far as it came under our observation, was so inferior that we hesitated to employ his services, but even he finally would not come. It was an experience which forcibly indicated the need of dental surgeons in the service. The end of the whole matter was the detachment of most of the men without having received any but palliative treatment and their transfer to Santo Domingo, where their chance for needed attention was, if possible, worse.'

"This quotation is only one of many similar reports from the various naval stations and ships, and with reference to our extensive service in equatorial latitudes it is to be pointed out that teeth deteriorate with particular rapidity in the Tropics. The importance of having skilled dentistry within the reach of those on duty in the outlying and isolated stations is evident, and at the large stations, where recruits are assembled and apprentices are trained, the value of the service of such professional attention is of no less moment.

"Dental surgeons are needed in the Navy quite as much as, if not more than, in the Army, which service enjoys free treatment by dentists employed in accordance with law, and it seems an unjust discrimination against the enlisted men of the Navy not to provide for similar dental work, especially in view of the universally recognized economic importance of sound teeth in military service."

A similar bill was favorably reported to the House in the first session of the Fifty-ninth Congress (H. Rept. 2181), and the same is herewith appended as a part of this report:

"The Committee on Naval Affairs, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 13851) authorizing the appointment of dental surgeons in the Navy, report the same without amendment and recommend its passage.

"A bill substantially the same as this was recommended by the Navy Department in the following letter:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, March 2, 1904.

SIR: Referring to the Department's letters of May 29, 1902, January 26 and February 8, 1904, reporting upon bills for the employment of dental surgeons in the Navy, and recommending the enactment of a measure authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to employ under contract not more than fifteen such surgeons, I have the honor to state that after further consideration of the matter the Department withdraws its previous recommendations in the premises and recommends instead the passage of the measure of which a draft is inclosed. The main points of difference between the bill heretofore suggested and that now proposed are that the latter authorizes thirty instead of fifteen dental surgeons and provides that they shall have the rank and pay of acting assistant surgeons, instead of being employed under contract at not to exceed $1,800 per annum.

Acting assistant surgeons, of whom twenty-five were authorized by the act of May 4, 1898 (30 Stat., 380), to be appointed by the President for temporary service, have the rank of assistant surgeons and receive the pay provided for the latter by section 1556 of the Revised Statutes, namely: During the first five years after date of appointment, when at sea, $1,700; on shore duty, $1,400; on leave or waiting orders, $1,000; after five years from such date, when at sea, $1,900; on shore duty, $1,600; on leave or waiting orders, $1,200.

Very respectfully,

W. H. MOODY, Secretary.

Hon. EUGENE HALE,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs, United States Senate.

At present there is no provision of law under which the Department can employ dental surgeons except one for service at the Naval Academy.

Surgeon-General Rixey informs this committee that the dental operations performed by the hospital stewards "are limited to simple procedures and urgent cases," that "this arrangement is a makeshift unsatisfactory to the Bureau," that "the necessity of the care of the teeth of the enlisted men existed and its importance to the health of the Navy is appreciated," and therefore this makeshift was resorted to "until legislation could be obtained giving advantages to the enlisted men of the Navy similar to those which the Army has had for several years."

To show the estimate of the importance and value of the service rendered by the dentists in the United States Army the Surgeon-General submitted copies of reports of Army officers, from which we quote the following extract from the report of the Surgeon-General United States Army:

The energies and resources of the Dental Corps have been taxed to their fullest extent in caring for those officers and enlisted men who have sought their services for the relief of suffering, and this has made it necessary in some instances for the dental surgeons to operate daily from 8 a. m. to 5 or 6 p. m. The great amount of service that has been rendered by the dental surgeons could not have been accomplished but for these long hours of work and the assistance accorded them through the extra details of members of the Hospital Corps.

The tabulation of diseases and injuries of the mouth and jaws, of the teeth and gums, and of operations and treatment which follow shows that a large part of the time and skill of the dental surgeons was expended in giving relief from the suffering caused by dental caries, pulpitis, pericementitis, alveolar abscess, pyorrhea alveolaris, and gingivitis. The comparatively large number of teeth extracted is due to the great prevalence of dental caries of a severe type among the enlisted men who are serving or have served in Cuba, Porto Rico, or the Philippines.

The services of the dental surgeons have been highly appreciated by the officers and enlisted men of the Regular and Volunteer armies, and have proved very satisfactory to the Medical Department, because they have been able to relieve a great amount of acute suffering and to conserve a large number of teeth and restore them to a healthy condition, thus almost immediately returning to duty many cases that were previously carried for several days upon the company's sick report. This has resulted in greatly reducing the loss of valuable time to the service.

[Extract from the Surgeon-General's indorsement of Senate bill 5420.]

The dental surgeons appointed in accordance with the act of February 2, 1901, are rendering excellent service, and their services are highly appreciated by the officers and enlisted men of the Army, especially in the Philippines and at the large military posts in the United States. A larger number could be utilized to good advantage, and the permanent retention of dental surgeons as part of the military establishment will, in my opinion, be in interest of the service.

[Extract from the report of General Grant, Department of Texas.]

DENTAL SURGEONS.

* * * * * * *

In my opinion, after careful investigation, the principal needs of the service, with respect to dental surgeons, are: First, more dental surgeons; second, a suitable operating room at each post; third, some positive and practicable methods compelling enlisted men to give proper attention to personal care of the teeth. I believe that there should be three dental surgeons assigned to this Department, if possible, but not less than two under any circumstances. It is well known that the Philippine climate has a deleterious effect upon teeth, and every regiment, before being sent to the Philippines, should have careful attention given to dental requirements, while those regiments returning should be no less carefully attended to in this regard.

[Extract from a letter from Col. Marion P. Maus, United States Army.]

HEADQUARTERS TWENTIETH UNITED STATES INFANTRY,
Malate Barracks, Manila, P. I., May 20, 1904.

THE MILITARY SECRETARY,
War Department, Washington, D. C.
(Through military channels.)

SIR: I have the honor to invite attention to the importance of dentists in the Army, especially at remote stations, in order that officers and enlisted men may have proper treatment.

While in command at Camp Marahui, Mindanao, certain officers, including myself, and a number of enlisted men suffered very much from the want of such service. Later, however, a dentist was provided, and great relief and benefit were realized.

There are times when the services of a dentist are as necessary as that of an Army surgeon. From my experience in the service, including all parts of the United States and dependencies, I can testify to the importance of this branch of the service and to much suffering from the want of it.

It would, perhaps, be desirable to have dental surgeons assigned to certain regiments in the same way as chaplains. * * *

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

MARION P. MAUS,
Colonel Twentieth United States Infantry, Commanding.

There exists in the Navy as much, if not more, urgent need of the service of dental surgeons than exists in the Army, and quite as potent reasons, both humane and economic, for supplying the need. First, because of the early age at which a large percentage enter the naval service; second, because of the longer periods those at sea are inaccessible to competent dentists.

The apprentice boys in training schools and on ships, who February 1, 1904, numbered 4,519, are taken in the service when the care of the dental surgeon is necessary to protect them from the effects of dental disorders, which either immediately or later, in the absence of such care, affect for life their general health, comfort, longevity, and efficiency.

The Government assumes, in a sense, the guardianship of these boys when it receives them for life service in the Navy; therefore for humane reasons nothing so vitally affecting their health and comfort should be neglected.

The attention of this committee was called to charts made by a doctor of medicine and dental surgery, employed as a hospital steward in the naval service, which show the condition of the mouths and teeth of fifty boys now, or recently, in training at the naval training station at Newport. One apprentice, but 16 years of age, had lost every one of the teeth from his upper jaw; another, aged 18 years, exhibited cavities in his fourteen upper teeth; another, aged 16 years, had lost practically all of his molar teeth, and the few remaining teeth were imperfect; another, aged 17 years, had lost seven teeth, and another, aged 18 years, had lost seven molar teeth. Several others of the fifty cases, from 16 to 18 years of age, had lost from three to six teeth. It was said of these cases, in general, that they presented either ordinary cavities of decay; dead teeth; inflamed gums; chronic abscesses, discharging pus in the mouth; pus-producing diseases of the teeth, gums, and underlying bone, or germ-laden foreign matter in contact with the gums and teeth. Such conditions cause gastric and intestinal disorders, impair vitality, and make one more susceptible to infectious diseases. Experts in dentistry inform us that, under present conditions, a large percentage of the cases exhibited from this one station must inevitably lose their teeth at an early age, which may render them pensionable under existing law.

There are no available statistics showing the conditions throughout the Navy, but the general condition is probably well illustrated by the reports from two vessels, covering in each instance a period of one year, which, summarized, are as follows:

[From the U. S. receiving ship Wabash.]

The hospital steward detailed to dental service:

Restored by filling, crowning, etc	teeth	990
Treatment for various diseases	do	502
Extracted	do	92
Simple, chronic, and ulcerated conditions of the gums treated	cases	227
Diseased nerves of teeth treated	do	165
Dead teeth treated and filled	do	110

[United States hospital ship.]

* * * I was employed for twelve months by special agreement with the Navy Department to service as a dental surgeon for the officers and enlisted men of the U. S. S. Yosemite, and during that time more than 75 per cent of the officers and enlisted men required and received dental service at my hands. Many of the cases were of a more or less serious character, and not a few of them had resulted from incompetent dental service rendered by men who were not educated to dentistry. No class of men are so helplessly in need of skilled dentistry as the men of the United States Navy. I did dental work both while the ship was at anchor in the harbor and while at sea.

ARTHUR R. BENNETT, D. D. S.

As dental conditions in the Navy probably differ from those in the Army only by reason of the earlier age at enlistment and the longer period of service in the former, we quote from three physicians experienced in Army medical service, as follows:

[Thomas S. Latimer, M. D.]

There can be no doubt that many soldiers were as effectually disabled by toothache, facial neuralgia, and other ailments, oral and gastric, due to lack of proper treatment, as from any other form of sickness or from gunshot wounds.

Precisely as the exhaustion, exposure, and unsuitability of food incident to an active campaign is the need of good masticatory organs. These being neglected or improperly treated, scurvy, dyspepsia, dysentery, and diarrhea are prone to ensue.

Nor is there any disability from any injury or sickness, even where not directly connected with imperfect mastication, that is not more protracted when mouth complications exist.

I need scarcely say that no ailments occasion greater suffering than toothache and neuralgia arising from decayed teeth. Nor are any more susceptible of prompt and complete relief under proper management. I may add that the regimental surgeon is incompetent to render the service required.

[Thomas Opie, M. D.]

That the health, strength, longevity, and courage of the soldier depend in large measure upon his powers of mastication can not be questioned. The dental specialist is best equipped for dealing with these lesions of the teeth, and surely the man who fights his country's battles has the right to claim the comfort and health which accrue from their being in perfect order.

[W. O. Owens, M. D.]

For seven years I have been giving especial attention to the diseases of the mouth and teeth because of their influence on the general health. During the time in which I was in charge of Corregidor Hospital about 300 soldiers, more or less disabled by dental disorders, were under treatment. I recall one case in particular, a diarrheal trouble of several months' standing, which resisted treatment until placed under the care of a dentist, whose treatment, directed to the mouth alone, effected a cure and the restoration of the soldier to active duty in two weeks. There were fifteen or twenty similar cases, known as pyorrhea of the sockets of the teeth, with pus, bathing the teeth, mixing with food, and entering therewith the alimentary tract. Neglected, such cases cause a pensionable disability.

When men are kept at sea continuously for a considerable time or located at remote stations where dental surgeons are inaccessible, it seems to us an inexcusable hardship, and the neglect of proper treatment for the teeth may ultimately result in great expense through pensions, besides the inhumanity and suffering which necessarily occurs in the absence of prompt and scientific treatment of the teeth when needed. The charts or diagrams of some fifty or more particular cases represented to this committee from a single station, at Newport, R. I., is ample proof of conditions which ought not to exist.

We therefore recommend that House bill 13851 be enacted.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know the amendment is subject to the point of order, but I hope, as the Senator from Maine is in favor of the proposition, he will not make the point of order.

Mr. HALE. I wish I could waive it, but, as the Senator says, it is a scheme of general legislation, and I am constrained to make the point of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MILTON. On page 46, after line 22, I move to insert the following paragraph:

To complete officers' quarters, Marine Barracks, navy-yard, Pensacola, Fla., $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DANIEL. After the word "cents," in line 12, page 73, I move to insert:

Provided, however, That the pay of draftsmen, Department of Marine Engineering and Naval Construction, shall be increased in the same ratio as the professor of mechanical drawings.

The draftsmen in the Department of Marine Engineering and Naval Construction perform the same duties, so far as the instruction of midshipmen is concerned, as the professor of mechanical drawings. The object of the amendment is simply to give them the same proportionate increase that applies to those who are in similar employment, and it would increase it from $1,800 a year to $2,160.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. McCUMBER. I hope the Senator in charge of the bill will consent to that amendment. I think there is an error in not including the draftsmen among others, and it can be taken into consideration in conference.

Mr. HALE. That is all right.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Let it be understood that the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES] goes over until to-morrow morning. Otherwise the bill is completed. I will say that I shall ask the Senate to resume the consideration of the bill to-morrow, directly after the routine morning business is finished.

I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CULBERSON. Before the motion is made, I invite the attention of the Senator from Maine to the fact that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] has given notice that he desires to address the Senate to-morrow morning after the routine business. The notice is on the Calendar and has been there for a day or two.

Mr. HALE. I am very desirous, of course, and I think every Senator is, of getting the pending bill out of the way. Other appropriations bills are waiting. But we arrange these matters by conferences with Senators. If the Senator from Alabama in the morning feels that he desires and must go on, of course we do not interfere with Senators when they want to make speeches. But some time we must come to a point where we have to pass the appropriation bills. I will say to the Senator from Texas that I will confer with the Senator from Alabama, and nothing shall be done that will be displeasing to him.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 4 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, April 24, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, April 23, 1908.

[Continuation of the legislative day of Monday, April 20, 1908.]

The recess having expired, at 11.30 o'clock a. m. the House was called to order by the Speaker.

OREGON AND CALIFORNIA LAND GRANT.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. It is evident to the Chair that there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors. The Sergeant-at-Arms will notify absent Members. As many as favor the motion will, as their names are called, answer "aye;" as many as are opposed will answer "no," and those present and not voting will answer "present," and the Clerk will call the roll.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5295. An act for the erection of a monument to the memory of Gen. William Campbell.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 15852. An act to confer title in fee and to authorize the disposition of certain lots now situate on Hot Springs Reservation, in the State of Arkansas, and for other purposes.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. 5295. An act for the erection of a monument to the memory of Gen. William Campbell—to the Committee on the Library.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 15219. An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909;

H. R. 15852. An act to confer title in fee and to authorize the disposition of certain lots now situate on Hot Springs Reservation, in the State of Arkansas, and for other purposes.

MEMORIAL EXERCISES ON LATE SENATORS MALLORY AND BRYAN, OF FLORIDA.

The SPEAKER. Pending the announcement, by unanimous consent, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] desires to make a request.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the order which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. SPARKMAN] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the order which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the House shall meet at 12 m. on Sunday, May 3, which shall be set aside for memorial addresses on the life, character, and public services of Hon. S. R. MALLORY, late a United States Senator from the State of Florida.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on agreeing to the order.

The question was taken, and the order was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the order which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That Sunday, May 3, at the conclusion of the addresses on the life, character, etc., of the late STEPHEN R. MALLORY shall be set apart for memorial addresses on the life, character, and public services of Hon. WILLIAM J. BRYAN, late United States Senator.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on agreeing to the order.

The question was taken, and the order was agreed to.

REPRINT OF BILL.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for reprint of the bill H. R. 20472.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20472) for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or unlabeled paint, turpentine, or linseed oil.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Reserving the right to object, this is merely for the reprint of a bill, is it not?

Mr. MARSHALL. That is all. The reprint of a bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Which is exhausted?

Mr. MARSHALL. Yes.

OREGON AND CALIFORNIA RAILROAD LAND GRANT.

The SPEAKER. The ayes have it. The resolution is agreed to. The Clerk will report the joint resolution. The House will be in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. R. 48) instructing the Attorney-General to institute certain suits, etc.

Resolved, etc., That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to institute and prosecute any and all suits in equity, actions at law, and other proceedings which he may deem adequate and appropriate to enforce any and all rights and remedies of the United States of America in any manner arising or growing out of or pertaining to either or any of the following-described acts of Congress, to wit: "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Central Pacific Railroad in California to Portland, in Oregon," approved July 25, 1866, as amended by the acts approved June 25, 1868, and April 10, 1869; also "An act granting lands to the State of Oregon to aid in the construction of a military wagon road from the navigable waters of Coos Bay to Roseburg, in said State," approved March 3, 1869; also "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Portland to Astoria and McMinnville, in the State of Oregon," approved May 4, 1870, including all rights and remedies in any manner relating to the lands, or any part thereof, granted by either or any of said acts; and in and by any and all such suits, actions, or proceedings the Attorney-General shall, in such manner as he shall deem appropriate, assert all rights and remedies existing in favor of the United States relating to the subject of such suits, actions, and proceedings, including the claim on behalf of the United States that the lands granted by each of said acts respectively, or any part thereof, have been and are forfeited to the United States by reason of any breaches or violations of any of the terms or conditions of either or any of said acts which may be alleged and established in any such suits, actions, or proceedings; it not being intended hereby to determine the right of the United States to any such forfeiture or forfeitures, but it being intended to fully authorize the Attorney-General in and by such suits, actions, or proceedings to assert on behalf of the United States and the court or courts before which such suits, actions, or proceedings may be instituted or pending to entertain, consider, and adjudicate the claim and right of the United States to such forfeiture or forfeitures, and if found to enforce the same: Resolved further, That the authority and direction hereinbefore given shall extend to any and all suits, actions, or proceedings which may be instituted or pending under the authority of the Attorney-General at the time of the adoption and approval hereof.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] for the purpose of offering his amendment.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, however, That this resolution shall not relate to any lands for which patents have been issued, which are now held by bona fide purchasers, other than railroad corporations, or corporations or persons holding title for any such railroad corporations as trustees to secure any bonded or other indebtedness, or for any purpose whatsoever.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce that he will recognize the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] for one hour and a half. There was an understanding between gentlemen that an hour and a half of time should be consumed by those for the bill without the amendment and an hour and a half of time by those who favor the amendment. If there be no objection, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] to control that time. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] at what place in the resolution his amendment is intended to be inserted?

Mr. FORDNEY. On page 3, line 8, after the word "same."

Mr. MONDELL. Page 3, line 8——

Mr. FORDNEY. After the word "same."

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that this is an exceedingly important bill, and the Chair trusts that the House will be in order, refraining from conversation during its consideration. [Applause.] The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, in the statement which I made on yesterday I very briefly and hurriedly outlined the history of the grants referred to in this resolution and the policy of the railway companies in the disposition of the land. I can not discuss that question further at this time, as I desire to yield to other gentlemen for a discussion of the resolution. But I desire to very briefly emphasize one fact with regard to this Senate resolution, and that is that the passing of the resolution does not unsettle or jeopardize any man's title more than it is now jeopardized and unsettled.

On the contrary, the passage of this resolution and the proceedings which will be had under it are absolutely necessary and essential to determine the rights and the title of all the parties in interest, the people, the Government, and the purchasers from the railways. So clear and patent has this been to the purchasers of the grant that the present holders of 90,000 acres of the grant to the Coos Bay military road some time ago applied to the Attorney-General in writing, asking him to institute proceedings in court for the purpose of determining their title. These titles have been sharply challenged, all of them, not by the act of the Government, but by reason of the notorious fact of the wide violation of the terms of the grant; and there must be such action as is contemplated by this resolution before it shall be known or determined what the rights of the Government, the railway company, and the purchasers are. Therefore the resolution ought unquestionably to be passed.

Now, as to the amendment which has been proposed. My opinion is that nothing could occur which would be so harmful or disastrous to the interests of the Government, of the people of the United States, and of innocent bona fide purchasers themselves as the adoption of this amendment. The probability is that the court would hold it to be unconstitutional, as being discriminatory, as being class legislation; and so at the end of long and tedious litigation, the court of last resort having declared the whole resolution unconstitutional, the titles of the so-called "innocent purchasers" would be in the same position they are to-day—challenged and insecure. If the court did not hold this amendment unconstitutional, it is altogether probable that the Attorney-General would find it utterly impossible to assert the rights and the remedies of the Government and people if this amendment is adopted. If it is contended that limitations contained in this grant constitute a condition subsequent, then the conditions subsequent, if such they be, have been breached in the sales in violation of those conditions; and if the Congress, at the same time that it authorized the institution of the suits, provides that we shall forgive and condone the very breaches on which our suit must be founded, any suit undertaken by the Government would be altogether futile and useless, and in that event the titles of the so-called "bona fide purchasers" would still be in their present unsatisfactory and insecure condition.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. MONDELL. I am sorry I can not yield.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I am on your side of the question.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, the rights of all bona fide purchasers from the railroad companies will be fully preserved under this resolution without amendment. A court of equity which must pass upon these matters will and must take into consideration the equity of these purchasers. They will be taken into consideration, and all innocent purchasers will unquestionably be protected. But if now, in the institution of the suit, in authorizing the Attorney-General to proceed and assert all the rights and remedies of the Government, we condone the very acts, the very breaches, upon which we are proposing to assert this forfeiture, what use will it be for the Attorney-General to institute any suit? So in the interest of the people, in the interest of the Government, and in the interest of the purchasers themselves this resolution should be passed, and passed without a word or line of amendment.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Do I understand this committee stands 15 to 1 against this amendment?

Mr. MONDELL. The Committee on Public Lands stands practically unanimously against the amendment.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is the Attorney-General and the Department of Justice against the amendment?

Mr. MONDELL. The Attorney-General has said if any amendment is adopted it is very questionable whether they will institute any suit, because he believes it will not be possible for the Government to assert its rights and remedies; and nothing could occur, as I said before, that will be so harmful to the innocent purchaser, the bona fide purchaser, as to have a condition arise in which no suit can be instituted.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. So that the committee, the Attorney-General, and the Senate of the United States are for the original resolution?

Mr. MONDELL. Without amendment.

I now yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, this resolution is one of the most important matters that has been considered at this session of Congress; and while it is totally impossible for any gentleman here to discuss the subject adequately within the brief time that has been alloted to me, I want to call the attention of the Members of the House to some vital facts which, in my judgment, make necessary the adoption of the resolution without any amendments. Permit me to state, for fear that I may fail to do so before my time expires, that I fear the adoption of this amendment or any similar amendment will thwart the very vital purposes of the resolution itself, and in the end defeat the object of the Government in preparing to institute these suits.

Listen! In 1866 Congress passed an act granting a large area of lands to railroad companies for the purpose of aiding in the construction of railroads. The time limit provided in that act expired. In 1868 the time was extended. In 1869 the time was again extended, and a limitation was put in the act, providing that the railroad companies should sell those lands to actual settlers only, and in areas not exceeding 160 acres to each settler, and for a price not to exceed $2.50 an acre. The Congress of the United States then sought to protect the State of Oregon against just what has happened there. While it was voting this large area of land to aid in the construction of railroads, it sought also to provide for the settlement and the upbuilding of the territory which constitutes a large part of the southwestern portion of the State of Oregon. Notwithstanding the limitations passed upon the power of the railroad to grant these lands, as I have explained them, the railroad, with the exception of a few cases, has totally disregarded those limitations, and the grantees of the railroad company have amassed them in large areas. There were patented to this railroad almost 3,000,000 acres of land, and the railroad company has sold about 813,000 acres of the lands so patented to it, and now it has announced its policy of reserving absolutely from sale the remaining two million eighty thousand and a little more acres of land still held under the terms of this grant, so as to block forever the building of homes in that portion of the State of Oregon.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROBINSON. I have only a few minutes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I want to know whether these lands were not mortgaged.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am going to state that. These lands were sold by the railroad company. Three hundred and sixty-three thousand acres, in violation of the express terms of the grant, the conditions subsequent, if you please, expressed in the grant itself, have been acquired by thirty-eight purchasers, and it is these parties who are primarily interested in the adoption of this proposed amendment. They have not only gobbled up and assumed control of these lands which Congress appropriated or granted for two purposes—the building of a railroad and the settling up of that territory in Oregon with actual homes—but they have enabled these parties to acquire them in such amounts as in all probability will forever prevent the building of homes there. Now, the railroad company has not only conveyed a portion of these lands, but it has executed a mortgage of $20,000,000 on the remainder of them, and God only knows what conveyances are outstanding and not on the record. I am opposed to the adoption of this amendment, because I believe that the courts of my country, that are charged with the construction and the enforcement of its laws, have the power to do equity and can do equity to all parties.

I am further opposed to the adoption of this amendment because the Attorney-General of the United States says that its adoption will greatly embarrass the Department of Justice in the enforcement of this law. I am further opposed to the adoption of the amendment because it might be considered as a legislative act, treating those limitations as covenants only and not as conditions subsequent, and if that be done, then your remedy is against the railroad company only, that has already placed a mortgage of $20,000,000 upon the remaining property. The courts must determine in the lawsuits whether these limitations were conditions subsequent or merely covenants, and that will determine the rights and remedies of the people of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, there are two sides to this proposition. I speak for the people of the United States. The public domain of the United States from the beginning of our history has been treated and regarded as a resource which the Government may well use in establishing and providing for the maintenance of homes. But often during our history has this great fundamental principle in the administration of our public-land laws been violated, and in this case openly and flagrantly violated.

We are told now that parties who purchase under the terms of that grant ought to be relieved from any liability whatever. If you adopt this amendment, you make impossible, in my judgment, the enforcement of the terms of that grant, and you throttle the power of the Department of Justice to bring and maintain these suits.

Another proposition; if when Congress becomes possessed of the facts, it appears that hardship has been done by the decision of any court, or injustice, if you please, done by a court of equity, then Congress, with the knowledge of the facts in its possession, can pass remedial legislation.

But it is proposed by the adoption of this amendment to keep out of court, prevent investigation, prevent disclosure, if you please, of the circumstances under which these lands were acquired by parties who get the land by fraud, contrary to the terms of the grant to the railroad company. Mr. Speaker, there has not been, I repeat, a more important matter proposed to this Congress. If we want to maintain the integrity of our public-land laws, if we want the power of the United States

Government and its courts to stand behind the enforcement of its laws, if we want to protect the public domain from the tread of the spoiler, then let us vote down this amendment and adopt the resolution. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY], in whose district these lands are situated.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, the title to these lands passed to the present holders under the act of 1869. The acts of 1866 and 1868 applied to a company on the west side of the Willamette River, and when the act of 1869 was passed a company on the east side of the Willamette River, whose successors are the present holders of the land, took advantage of it. The company gladly accepted the terms of this grant, and in this act of 1869 were these provisions: That the land should be sold to actual settlers only in lots of 160 acres and at a price not exceeding $2.50 per acre.

Inquiry was made yesterday on the floor of the House as to why action by the Government had not begun sooner. The railroad company did not begin to sell these lands in large bodies generally until about the years 1894 and 1895, and it sold them on long-time contracts. The contracts were not known to the public until the terms of the contracts expired, the final payments made, and the deeds registered in the various counties. Then it became known that the company was violating the terms of the grant.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Will the gentleman state what was the length of the term of these long-term contracts that he speaks of?

Mr. HAWLEY. I understand the contracts generally ran from seven to ten years. The company since 1902 has refused to sell any of the land, with a few unimportant exceptions. Since 1902 it has held in its power so far as we know without an intention to sell, unless there have been further secret contracts, 2,300,000 acres of land, worth more than $35,000,000. In a public speech made at Oakland, Cal., in September last, in answer to a question by the governor of Oregon, the present president of the holding company declared that it was the intention of the railroad company not to dispose of any more of these lands.

The question at issue now is not what effect the adoption of this resolution will have on the lands still supposed to be held by the railroad company, but is, How will the resolution affect the purchasers from the railroad company? When the matter was brought before the Committee on the Public Lands a large number of telegrams were sent in stating various disasters that would happen to people in the State of Oregon if Senate joint resolution No. 48 was passed unamended. They were largely made on the same pattern, at least those that I received and those that I saw. An attorney of the Southern Pacific Railroad, the present holding company, asked the president of the leading commercial organization in one of the principal cities of my district to send me a similar telegram, but, instead, he refused and wrote me that the telegrams were based upon an entirely erroneous assertion, that the title to no farm, that the title to no town lot, that the title to no agricultural land owned by the small holder was involved in the operation of the resolution as it stood.

The people in my district, in which these lands lie, have been writing me very freely on all subjects, and I have yet to receive a letter citing a special instance of anyone who owns a town lot or a farm, or any man who owns orchard land, saying that his title is called in question or is in any way affected by this resolution.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAWLEY. I will; but my time is short.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I understand the object of this resolution is to make available any right the Government now has to the lands that have heretofore been patented, and that it creates no new rights?

Mr. HAWLEY. It creates no new rights.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It puts no man's property in jeopardy or in peril, but simply makes available any rights the Government may have?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes; and submits the matter to a court of equity, where no innocent man was ever hurt.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Does it create any new ground of forfeiture?

Mr. HAWLEY. No; no new ground of forfeiture.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Merely provides for investigation when a forfeiture operates under existing law?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes. It has been held in this country under decisions of the Supreme Court that the grantor must make some proof of his determination to reenter, and this resolution simply supplies that determination. If the Government has a right to reenter, this will be determined by the court to which the matter is submitted. One hundred and twenty-seven thousand acres of these lands have been sold in compliance with the terms of the grant, and about 170,000 acres have been sold in compliance except as to price, the price being a little higher than $2.50. These 300,000 acres of lands will not be affected at all, and all these small holders to which reference has been made will be entirely unaffected. Those who are asking the adoption of this amendment to the resolution, I understand, are mainly comprised in two classes—large lumber manufacturing concerns, large sawmill operators, who have bought great bodies of these lands in violation of the terms of the grant, and others who have bought them with the idea that in the future their value will increase. They have all maintained in the hearings before the Committee on Public Lands that their titles were good, and if their titles are good no court of equity will ever do them anything but justice and all that is right in the matter and grant them all the rights and protection that they are entitled to.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish the gentleman would tell us something about the amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. This amendment as proposed provides that bona fide purchasers other than railroad corporations or persons holding title for any such railroad corporation as trustees to secure any bonded or other indebtedness, or for any purpose whatsoever, shall not be affected by this resolution. There are three dangers in this amendment.

First, the first company that tried to accept the grant made by the act of 1869 was decided by the supreme court of the State of Oregon to be an invalid company. It may have been a de facto company, but was not a company de jure. When it went out of business and transferred the lands and all its property and business to the Oregon and California Railroad Company, it transferred them in the form of a sale. This amendment would include that in all probability.

The second danger comes from the two mortgages that have been placed on these lands by the railroad companies, one early in the history of the grant, of about $20,000,000, and placed on the land and the other property of the railroad company. The laws of the State of Oregon provide that title shall not pass to a mortgagee, who has only a lien upon the land; but this amendment says that only those who hold title for any such railroad company as trustees shall be excepted from the benefits of the amendment, and thus it operates to defeat the interests of the Government. On June 2, 1881, there was another mortgage placed on the land, and it is expressly excepted by the terms of this amendment and confirms the loss of the Government's interest. So that, if this amendment prevails, both those mortgages will be validated and all the actions thereunder, depriving the Government of the United States entirely of any interest in, or right to, the lands yet undisposed of by the railroad company.

The third danger arises from the fact that secret sales have been made in the past, and we have reason to believe that the railroad company has made secret sales within a recent period. Mr. Harriman, in the Portland Telegram, in an interview under date of September 2, 1907, says this:

> Yes; the Southern Pacific, too, but the Southern Pacific hasn't much land. You see before we came into the Southern Pacific the company was pressed for money and was disposing of lands and giving options to syndicates and speculators, and we didn't know how much land we had, so we stopped until options expired to ascertain just what we had in land.

We do not know what secret sales have been recently made, but we have reason to believe that there are many options, or contracts, secret in nature, on almost all the lands; and that these were made within a very recent time conveying large bodies of lands to other purchasers, and this amendment will take out all right the United States has in these lands, so that when the amendment passes there will be nothing left.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield three more minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think I shall not take the three minutes that the gentleman has very kindly yielded to me. I have only two or three things more to say. The first is that the Department of Justice is kindly disposed toward the interests of all; it has no ill will or animus toward any of them. It will desire and will urge that all the rightful interests of everyone be protected, and, as I said a moment ago, I understand that when a man goes into a court of equity with clean hands—that is, as an innocent purchaser—all his rights are protected. More than a year ago Judge Ballinger, Commissioner of the General Land Office, pointed out the remedy that the Government had against the purchasers if it desired to exercise it and be harsh against them, and that was to set aside the titles to the lands they had obtained.

The reason for this resolution is that while the Government has already the right to enforce all remedies except forfeiture; after eight months' study of the situation and study of the authorities and decisions of the Supreme Court, the Department of Justice became convinced that the court to which it applied for an enforcement of its rights and remedies might possibly hold that forfeiture was the proper remedy for the Government, but if it failed to ask a forfeiture it might forever lose the rights and interests of the Government and people to these lands. It asks no new remedy against the railroad company. It only asks that remedy which has existed and been applied in a number of instances before in this country, the right to reenter, but it must be asserted by a declaration by the Congress of the United States, the grantors of the lands. There must be a declaration by Congress that it intends to reenter before the Government can reenter. If the terms of the grant are enforced against the railroad company, what will become of the land? If specific performance is decreed, the terms of the grant will be enforced and the land sold as therein provided unless Congress takes some action otherwise disposing of it. If the courts decree a forfeiture, then the lands will be returned to the general public domain of the United States to be disposed of under the existing laws of the United States, or to be disposed of under such laws as Congress in the future may enact. The entire question, I will have gentlemen observe, is submitted to the court, and everyone can have all his rights enforced and all his rights protected in the court of equity. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I trust that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] will now consume a portion of his time. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to my colleague [Mr. DENBY].

Mr. DENBY. Mr. Speaker, very reluctantly and with deep regret I find myself in opposition to a measure which seems to have back of it the good opinion of so many distinguished gentlemen, but either something is wrong with my understanding or something is wrong with this resolution as it stands to-day before the House. I was brought up to believe, and I have always believed, that it is better that many guilty men should escape than that one innocent man should suffer. That is a fundamental principle of our jurisprudence, but of late years it seems to be undergoing a curious perversion, manifested now in the very temple of justice itself, which appears to maintain to this House that it is better that many innocent men should suffer rather than one guilty man should escape. The terms of this bill unamended seem to me vicious in the extreme. It provides that the Attorney-General shall be directed to enforce whatever remedies shall be found by the United States, including a claim on behalf of the United States that the land grants of each of the acts referred to here, or any part thereof, have been and are forfeited to the United States by reason of any purchase or violation of any terms or contract of either of the said acts. The House should consider well whether or not that does not mean that in case in any one parcel of any of the lands granted under this act there is such a violation as would justify forfeiture, not only that parcel but all other parcels, however innocently they may have passed into the hands of other purchasers, shall be also forfeited at the same time.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DENBY. With great pleasure, although my time is short.

Mr. PARSONS. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to the statement of the Attorney-General, on page 15 of the hearings——

Mr. DENBY. I am very much afraid I shall have to ask the gentleman to take time of his own.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan declines to yield.

Mr. DENBY. The gentleman from Wyoming stated yesterday that the purpose of the bill was to enable such a forfeiture, but at the same time he stated that the rights of innocent purchasers shall be protected by the court. I would like to ask him how the rights of innocent purchasers can be protected by the court if there is a sweeping forfeiture of all the land involved under these grants? I would like to point out to the House the absolute certainty of innocence of a great many purchasers under this act. The act of 1866 does not contain any restriction whatsoever save that of mineral land, and the patents of the Government of the United States in many instances refer only to the act of 1866, so no matter how careful an investigation by any attorney about a purchase was he could not find anywhere any reference to the act of 1869 in regard to a sale of land of an amount not greater than 160 acres and for a price not greater than $2.50.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENBY. I am sorry that I can not. And so clear has it been, Mr. Speaker, that that is the case, and that careful investigation would not disclose any fault in the land grants, that the Government of the United States has repurchased some lands under these very grants and under these very patents after having the titles carefully examined, and has given in lieu thereof other scrip entitling the holders to enter upon other valuable United States lands. The Government has either been deceived or else never even thought that there was any fault or flaw in the patents issued by its own duly authorized officers under which title has been acquired by many innocent purchasers. It is stated that all innocent purchasers will be protected in court. It must be clear that during the pendency of all this litigation—and heaven only knows how long it will last—the purchaser, the holder, of any lands under these grants will have such a cloud placed upon his title that his land will be absolutely worthless to him. He can not raise a penny upon it, because no man will buy land that stands under the shadow of a United States forfeiture. If he is operating on those lands with a sawmill, he can not continue to operate for fear that if the land is declared forfeited later he will be held to have been a trespasser and be compelled to pay damages as well as to give up his title to the land.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that either this bill ought to be amended in such manner as to protect not the so-called "innocent purchaser," but the actual innocent purchaser, or else it ought to be defeated on this floor. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, it has been well said by the speaker that this resolution is the most important measure that has been brought before Congress in a long time. In my nine years in this House, gentlemen, it is my opinion that no measure of the importance of this resolution has been brought before this House. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] says to you that under this resolution no man who is a bona fide purchaser will be disturbed in his title. It is not only the opinion of myself but it is the opinion of the best counsel that can be employed in this country that the Attorney-General can not proceed to forfeit the title to a portion of those lands without forfeiting the title to all. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] say that those lands have been deeded to the railroad and wagon-road companies absolutely under the provisions of the act of April 10, 1869, which act carries a limitation as to the quantity of land that can be sold to any one purchaser and as to the price per acre to be obtained by the railroad company.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] says that he would protect everybody in their title. I want to read to the House just what the gentleman from Oregon said in his remarks before the Committee on Public Lands in their hearing. He said:

> But, as I said a moment ago, and have said to everybody—to the Government representatives and to others—we would be glad if it could be so arranged that all who ought to be protected could be protected. We do not want to see any of the industries disturbed. You can appreciate how we feel on that subject. I would like to see all our industries preserved, but we do not want to have the railroad company released from its obligations.

Mr. Speaker, I insist that this amendment offered by me and to be considered now in the House protects only the bona fide purchasers. What does the word "bona fide" mean, gentlemen? It means, first, that the purchaser must purge himself of any ill intent, any fraud, of any dishonest intent. He buys in good faith. He pays valuable consideration, and he purchases without fraud.

Now, I will show to you during my remarks, gentlemen, that the Government is barred by the statute of limitations against going into court and proceeding to annul those patents, and certainly patents that have been issued more than six years. It is very strange to me, gentlemen of this House, that the Committee on the Public Lands on February 11 last reported a bill that is now on the Calendar of the House affecting the title to lands in the Territory of New Mexico, namely, H. R. 16277, and report accompanying it; and it is to this effect, namely, that the United States granted to that Territory certain lands for school purposes and otherwise, and in that granting act, in the act that conveyed those lands to the Territory, there was a limitation as to the amount of land that could be sold to any one person, that being 160 acres. That is identically this case, my friends. There is a limitation in the act of Congress of April 10, 1869, that limits the amount to be sold by the railroad companies and the wagon-road companies to 160 acres. The Territory of New Mexico sold a great number of acres—a large quantity, about 100,000 in all—and as I take it from the report, the most of those lands were sold to four lumber concerns that built mills and began to operate and make lumber from the timber they cut from those lands.

The Government proceeded to stop them from taking the timber from this land, because the conveyance was not in accordance with the terms of the act that granted the land to the Territory, and what did the Committee on Public Lands do? It reported back that bill by a unanimous vote, recommending that the title to all such lands sold shall be confirmed.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Before proceeding, will the gentleman yield for a question or two I want to ask him in relation to this resolution?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I call your attention to the language of the amendment, and ask you why it was that the word "by" was employed before the word "person?" It reads, "to any lands for which patents have been issued which are now held by bona fide purchasers other than railroad corporations or corporations or persons." In regard to the words in the amendment, "or persons holding title," do you mean by "persons" those holding title as trustee?

Mr. FORDNEY. I mean this: It is contended by the Government that the railroad company, in order to evade the law, have transferred their land to a holding company. I do not wish to tie the hands of the Government because of such a transfer. I wish in no way to tie the hands of this Government in their effort to proceed against the railroad company and punish them for a violation of the law.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But, if you will excuse me, the last clause relates to something else.

Mr. FORDNEY. No, sir.

Mr. DOUGLAS (reading):

Or persons holding title for any such railroad corporation as trustees to secure any bonded or other indebtedness.

Mr. FORDNEY. As the gentleman from Oregon has said, there is a mortgage of $20,000,000 covering the land owned yet by the railroad company; but he failed to state that the mortgage covers not only the lands, but the rolling stock, the railroad line, the terminals, and all the property belonging to the railroad company, and if the title to these lands is forfeited, the security for these bonds is ample in the other property covered in the mortgage. I do not propose by this amendment to tie the hands of the Government from proceeding against any such holding company who are seeking to hold it as trustee or mortgagee.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I would like to know, if you can answer, what proportion of these lands are covered by this mortgage?

Mr. FORDNEY. That I can not tell. I imagine that all the land yet unsold by them to individuals or the companies holding from them. Now, let me say to you, further, gentlemen, the act of 1866, which granted the lands to the State of Oregon, or withdrew them from public entry for the benefit of the railroad company that was to build this railroad, had no limitations. It contained no limitation whatever as to the amount that might be sold by the railroad company proposing to construct the railroad. The company went back to Congress in 1868 and asked for an extension of time in which to build the railroad. Then they came back to Congress in 1869 and asked for additional time. Congress granted that time. I am going to read to you the language of that act. It is very short, and I will read it to the House:

An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Central Pacific Railroad, in California, to Portland, in Oregon, approved July 25, 1866, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to allow any railroad company heretofore designated by the legislature of the State of Oregon, in accordance with the first section of said act, to file its assent to such act in the Department of the Interior within one year from the date of the passage of this act; and such filing of its assent, if done within one year from the passage hereof, shall have the same force and effect to all intents and purposes as if such assent had been filed within one year after the passage of said act: Provided, That nothing herein shall impair any rights heretofore acquired by any railroad company under said act, nor shall said act or this amendment be construed to entitle more than one company to a grant of land.

Now comes the limitation.

Provided further, That the lands granted by the act aforesaid shall be sold to actual settlers only, in quantities not greater than one quarter section to one purchaser, and for a price not exceeding $2.50 per acre.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Oregon states that all the lands that have been sold by the railroad company are sold under the terms of that extension. I deny that, gentlemen, and I am going to prove to you that the gentleman from Oregon is mistaken.

Six-sevenths of all those lands that have been patented were patented under the terms of the act of 1866, and make no reference whatever to any other act, and here is an abstract of title taken from the records of Linn County, Oreg., where some of these lands are located, and here are the patents, and I am going to read one of these patents to you to show that if the act of 1869 had any bearing upon the act of 1866 the Government was negligent in making no reference to the act of 1869 in its patents.

Let me read an extract from the patent. I will not refer to the provision about the time in which they should build the road. Let me say there is no contention here on the part of the Government that the railroad companies and the wagon-road companies have not earned those lands. Every condition, according to the terms of the act, has been complied with in acquiring these lands and earning them. Here is a patent dated December 3, 1894, and it reads as follows:

The United States of America; To all to whom these presents shall come, Greeting: Whereas by the act of Congress approved July 25, 1866, "to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Portland in Oregon, thence southerly through the Willamette, Umpqua, and Rogue River valleys to the southern boundary of Oregon" authority is given to the Oregon and California Railroad Company, of Oregon, a corporation existing under the laws of the State "to construct a railroad and telegraph line" under certain conditions and stipulations—

And so on. It provides that on the completion of each 20 miles of line the President shall appoint a commission to inspect the roads, and if the commission reports that the road has been completed according to the terms of the act and so certifies to the President, the company then are entitled to select twenty sections of land for each mile of line built, ten sections on each side of the road.

Mr. HAWLEY. I want to ask if you are certain about the name of the county? Is it Crook County?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will see if it is. I may be wrong.

Mr. HAWLEY. There are none of these lands in Crook County.

Mr. FORDNEY. It is Linn County. The gentleman is right. Now, the commission was appointed. It reported back to the President that the road had been built according to the terms of the act. The railroad company filed their list of selections and the lands were patented. Here is a patent that carried 229,643.52 acres.

And that the same has been accepted by the President—

Referring to the report of the commission—

And whereas certain tracts of land have been listed by the duly authorized agent of the Oregon and California Railway Company, as shown by such agent's original lists of sections on record, approved by the local land officers, and now on file in this office;

And whereas said tracts of land lie within the territorial limits of said grants, and are particularly described as follows—

And so on, reserving to the Government all ores and minerals, not including iron and coal.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. Does not the part of the grant in question which refers to the issuing of a patent exist only in the act of 1866, in section 4, so that it was unnecessary for the Government, in reciting why it should issue a patent, to refer to any other acts than that of 1866?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; pardon me. The Supreme Court has said over and over again that the purchaser is not expected to go back of the language in the patent to find out what that patent means. The authority to issue the patent vests solely in the Government and the Government officers, elected and appointed to perform their duties; and if they omit from the patent any language in the law that should go there, the purchaser shall not be punished for the negligence of the officers of the Government. I can show you Supreme Court decisions here that I could cite to you until this time to-morrow.

Mr. PRINCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. PRINCE. If your contention is correct, that the Supreme Court has so held, then if a suit is brought to oust these people from their possession, they can plead that in defense?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, yes; they can do that, but what I want is not to clothe this Government with authority to take all these people into court, when to-day they have not got that authority. The statute of limitations operates against these patents, and I have here and will now call your attention to a decision of the Supreme Court, rendered no longer than Monday morning of this week, relating to the title to lands in the State of Michigan. I will quote to you what the court says:

The defendant claims that this strip—

There is a piece of land at Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., which a water-power company located, and in 1883 this Government issued a patent to that company for the land. Later on the Government goes into court and attempts to annul that patent and claims that the patent was unlawfully or erroneously issued, and here is what the court says:

The defendant claims this strip and the islands under a patent from the United States dated December 15, 1883, describing the land as bounded by the river St. Mary on the east, north, and west. The United States says the patent was void because the land had been reserved for public purposes and that even if it was valid the islands did not pass. The defendant replies that the land was not reserved, and also sets up the statute of limitations, act of March 3, 1891 (ch. 561, sec. 8, 26 Stats., 1093).

Let me tell you what that act of March 3, 1891, was. It fixed the time that this Government could go into court to recover title and annul the patent at five years—that is, any patent issued five years prior to that date, the Government could go into court at any time during the five years and proceed to annul a patent.

The circuit court dismissed the bill and its decree was affirmed by the circuit court of appeals. (125 Fed. Rep., 25.)

There is force in the contention of the United States that the land was reserved and that it had not been surveyed, but we find it unnecessary to state or pass upon the arguments, because we are of opinion that now the patent must be assumed to be good. The statute just referred to provides that "suits by the United States to vacate and annul any patent heretofore issued shall only be brought within five years from the passage of this act," that is, to say, from March 3, 1891. This land, whether reserved or not, was public land of the United States and in kind open to sale and conveyance through the Land Department. (United States v. Winona & St. Peter R. R. Co., 165 U. S., 463, 476.)

The patent had been issued in 1883 by the President, in due form and in the regular way. Whether or not he had authority to make it, the United States had power to make it or to validate it when made, since the interest of the United States was the only one concerned. We can see no reason for doubting that the statute, which is the voice of the United States, had that effect. It is said that the instrument was void and hence was no patent. But the patent presupposes an instrument that might be declared void. When it refers to "any patent heretofore issued" it describes the purpose and source of the document, not its legal effect. If the act were confined to valid patents, it would be almost or quite without use.

They construe the law to mean where a patent has been issued erroneously, as we claim in this case, by the Government, not referring to the act of 1869, which was an error on the part of the Government, that the present owner of that land should not suffer.

Further the court cites:

This statute must be taken to mean that the patent is to be held good and is to have the same effect against the United States that it would have had if it had been valid in the first place.

Here is a patent that the court recognized was invalid when issued, but on account of the lapse of time the Government is barred by the statute of limitations, and the court confirmed the title in the persons holding the land. I have forty such cases if I only had time to read them.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will yield if the gentleman will be brief.

Mr. PARSONS. May I ask the gentleman to cite a case which says that the patent should recite every act which granted the land to the railroad?

Mr. FORDNEY. I may get to that. Here is the act of 1896 referred to, which limits the time, and I will not take the time to read it because my time is limited. Here is the decision of the Supreme Court touching upon this question, and I want the House to bear long enough with me to read it. It is known as The United States v. The California and Oregon Land Company (148 U. S. Repts., 43).

This is one of the companies affected by this resolution, and the gentleman owning an interest in these lands sits in the gallery, and he and his associates have held these lands since 1877 under a patent which has the signature of President Grant, and that company has paid $167,000 to the State of Oregon in taxes on these lands.

It is a universal principle that, where power or jurisdiction is delegated to any public officer or tribunal over a subject-matter, the acts so done are binding and valid as to the subject-matter; and individual rights will not be disturbed collaterally for anything done in the exercise of that discretion within the authority and power conferred. The only questions which can arise between an individual claiming a right under the acts done, and the public, or any person denying its validity are power in the officer and fraud in the party. All other questions are settled by the decision made or the act done by the tribunal or officer, whether executive, legislative, judicial, or special, unless an appeal is provided for, or other revision, by some appellate or supervisory tribunal, as prescribed by law.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; if the gentleman will not take up too much of my time.

Mr. PARSONS. Did not the attorney for this very company request the Government to bring the suit so that title could be settled?

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not know what he did. I know I want to impress upon the gentlemen of this House that the title to these lands in the hands of these people to-day is unassailable, and what you will do by your resolution would be to give over to the courts the right to proceed, and some assistant attorney will bring these purchasers to court and haul them across the continent from one end to the other and compel them to defend their titles which they are secure in to-day, according to law, and the gentleman can not deny it.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman cited a case which I did not catch the volume of. I wish he would give it to me.

Mr. FORDNEY. United States report, volume 148, page 43. I have it right here. To continue:

It has been repeatedly held by the Supreme Court in many decisions rendered that the patent obviates the necessity of any further evidence of the grantee's right to the land, and it has also been said by the same court that a purchaser is not required to go behind the patent.

That is what the Supreme Court says:

Accordingly, it would seem that a purchaser from the patentee is entitled to regard the patent as correctly showing the grantee's title, and that the United States is not in a position to assert to the contrary. If a limitation to the act of 1869 was omitted from the patent through a misconception on the part of the Land Department, as to its scope and effect, the mistake is one which can not be corrected to the injury of the purchaser.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; if the gentleman makes it brief.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I have been endeavoring to read the amendment, and it seems somewhat peculiar to me, and I have no doubt that the gentleman can explain it in just a moment, satisfactory to him, at least.

Mr. FORDNEY. I will try to.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota (reading):

Provided, That this resolution shall not relate to any land for which patents have been issued which are now held by bona fide purchasers, other than railroad corporations, etc.

Mr. FORDNEY. Now, let me explain——

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Let me ask the question first. The reading of this amendment signifies, to my mind, that there are two classes of bona fide purchasers.

Mr. FORDNEY. No; not at all.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. That is the way it reads to me. One of them is the railroad, and if such should prove to be the case hereafter in court, would it not invalidate the whole resolution as being class legislation and unconstitutional? [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. I stated a while ago, while the gentleman was out perhaps—let me say further that some of the best attorneys in this country have passed upon that amendment and say it is not class legislation—that this Government to-day, through its Attorney-General and through the effect of this resolution, is trying to get authority to go into court and punish the offender, the railroad company.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Does not the gentleman consider that the railroads owning the lands are bona fide purchasers?

Mr. FORDNEY. Whether they are or not I do not care a snap, and I do not care anything about protecting them. They are able to look out for themselves.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Yes; but if we legislate, we must legislate for all alike.

Mr. FORDNEY. I decline to yield any further. What I want to do is to protect the innocent fellow that has no money to come here and defend his own title.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. His title seems to be from the same source and authority——

Mr. FORDNEY. I will not yield any more. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] states the lands have all been conveyed according to the terms of the act of 1869. Let me call attention to a significant fact. The limitations as to the sale of those lands in quantities and prices are contained in the act of 1869, and it is contended by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] and by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] that is public notice to everybody. The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] is an intelligent gentleman and is a lawyer, and before the Committee on the Public Lands he stated that he was born in 1864 in one of the counties in which some of those lands are situate and has lived there all his life until two years ago and had never heard of the act of 1869 [applause] until it was taken up in the courts of Oregon or in the legislature. Is it reasonable to suppose that the average layman purchasing lands and knowing nothing about law should know all about it, when Mr. HAWLEY, an intelligent gentleman and a lawyer, living on the land himself never heard of it? It is ridiculous.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; if it is brief.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will ask the gentleman if it is not true that the majority of the lands that have been purchased from the railroads have passed by quitclaim deeds from the railroad, and if that is not notice to everybody?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; that is not notice, and the Supreme Court says so. It may be in some cases, but not in others. Let me say to you, gentlemen of the House, that those lands have all been disposed of by the railroad companies either by quitclaim or special warranty known as "bargain-and-sale deeds" in the Pacific States, which means the conveyance only guarantees to the purchaser against the acts of the railroad companies, and not beyond that, and if the title to those lands is forfeited to this Government and taken away from the present holders, they have no recourse against anybody on God's green earth.

But you propose to take away from them every dollar's worth of property they have to-day.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will ask the gentleman if in the statement which was made, placed on my desk—I do not know whether the gentleman placed it there, yet I think it came under an envelope bearing his frank——

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; I did.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Did not you state in that all these transfers since 1896 have been made by quitclaim deed?

Mr. FORDNEY. That is an oversight. A bargain-and-sale deed is a quitclaim deed in every respect except as to the railroad company. Now, wait a minute, I can not yield further. Mr. Speaker, let me say to you the Booth-Kelly Lumber Company, which is one of the claimants here, purchased from the railroad company from time to time a sufficient quantity of land to amount to something over 67,000 acres. They have purchased this land in violation of the terms of that act, but here is a telegram from an officer of that company saying that no officer of that company ever heard of the limitations of these patents until two years ago, long after they had made all their purchases, and let me say again——

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. No, I will not yield; I want to make a point. Some of the land purchased by the Booth-Kelly Company from the railroad afterwards fell within the limits of forest reserve, and under the forest-reserve law each and every individual or set of individuals can convey such land to the Government by quitclaim deed when the abstract title is furnished showing their title to be perfect, and such persons can go elsewhere and select a like amount of acres anywhere over the public domain where there is unappropriated public lands, and the Booth-Kelly Lumber Company in one deed conveyed to the United States Government 9,000 acres of land, the title to which they obtained from the railroad company, and the Department of Justice or some lawyer or some man employed by the Government passed upon the title and pronounced it perfect. What do you say about canceling the title to these 9,000 acres now in the hands of the Government?

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield for a question? I just want to ask the gentleman if he is aware of the fact that one of the attorneys who gave that opinion was at the time of the passage of that act in the United States Senate, and I want to ask him further, is not that same attorney——

Mr. FORDNEY. I will reach that.

Mr. FERRIS. I would like to have the gentleman refer to that.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Williams was the Attorney-General under Grant, and was at the time that this act of 1869 was passed a United States Senator, and I have here—I have not time to read it—an exhaustive opinion by his firm, prepared for one of my constituents who purchased this land, stating that his title to this land is absolutely beyond attack by this Government or anybody. That is the point I was getting at.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. If that is so, they can defend successfully in court.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; you can take us into court, where we do not want to go.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. How many individuals will be affected or necessarily brought into court?

Mr. FORDNEY. One hundred and twenty-seven thousand acres of this land have been sold strictly in compliance with every condition of every act and in quantities less than 160 acres, and in 160 acres or less a hundred and seventy-odd thousand acres have been sold, but at a price slightly in excess of $2.50.

Now, then, the gentleman representing the Government said, "We do not propose to disturb these people at all;" but the city of Portland purchased 3,000 acres of this land, contrary to the terms of the act, on which the water supply of the city is situated. "We do not propose to disturb them," he says; but, gentlemen, let me say to you under the provisions of this resolution, or any law under God's sun, this Government can not go into court and forfeit a portion of these lands that have been sold, whether sold according to the terms of the contract or otherwise, without forfeiting all the lands. What are you going to do with these 127,000 acres where there has been no violation of law? "Why," he says, "temporarily"——

Mr. PARSONS rose.

Mr. FORDNEY. I can not yield. "Temporarily we will reinvest the title in the United States Government, and these people can come to Congress and ask for relief." Oh, that is what gentlemen said that were representing the Government. Your side of the argument does not meet mine at all, gentlemen. Reference has been made here that anybody purchasing these lands in quantities in excess of 160 acres, or in large quantities, are violators of the law; that they are speculators; that they are land grabbers. They do not say "land thieves," but they mean it.

What do you mean by that, gentlemen? The Booth-Kelly Lumber Company that holds title to 67,000 acres of those lands to-day has four sawmills located on those lands and railroads leading from the sawmills into the timber. They have in their employ 1,200 men, and in the 250 mills now cutting timber from those lands there are 8,000 men employed cutting timber and converting it into lumber, supporting a population of 40,000 people. In one place there is a little town there that has a population of 1,000 people, situated on section 13 and section 23 in township 8 south, of range 7—east or west, I have forgotten which. The title of all that property it is proposed by this resolution and by the Attorney-General to be reinvested in the United States, and then let those 40,000 people come to Congress and ask for relief. No, gentlemen; it is absurd upon its face. If the railroad company has violated this law, are you going to punish the 40,000 people who have invested all the money they have in the world in those lands? Did you ever hear tell of a shipowner sinking his ship and all on board in order to punish an unruly captain? Did you ever hear of a farmer setting fire to his wheat field in order to burn the Canadian thistle or cockle in it? Did you ever hear of a farmer burning his barn in order to kill the rats in the wheat bin? If there is a nigger in the fence, why don't you get after him? Why does not this Government proceed against the railroad company for selling those lands in violation of the law and collect the difference between the price obtained for the lands and the price which they were authorized to obtain?

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. What is to prevent the Government from commencing suits to work the forfeiture in these cases without this act? I simply ask for information.

Mr. FORDNEY. Why, I will say to you that the Government is barred by the statute of limitations from attacking any patent that has been issued longer than six years. And the heft of those lands have been patented more than six years ago, some patents beginning to issue in 1872.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Could not this six-year limitation be asserted even though this act should be passed, as a defense?

Mr. FORDNEY. I have just read you a decision rendered by the Supreme Court on Monday last, holding that act constitutional, and barring from the court or throwing the Government out of court in its effort to cancel a patent that was issued more than six years ago. Now, here is another decision. Mr. Justice Cooley, in his Constitutional Limitation, said:

> When the period prescribed by a statute has once run, so as to cut off the remedy which one might have had for the recovery of the property in the possession of another, the title of the property, irrespective of the original, is regarded in law as vested in the possessor, who is entitled to the same protection in respect to it which the owner is entitled to in other cases.

How much time have I consumed, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has consumed forty minutes.

Mr. FORDNEY. Well, I will close quickly here, because I want to give some other gentlemen time. When the United States waives its sovereignty, as occurs in these two statutes, they become statutes of repose. Mr. Cooley says that a subsequent repeal of the limitation law could not be given a retroactive effect which this resolution proposes to give, so as to disturb this title, which is vested as completely and perfectly and is as safe from legislative interference as it would have been had it been perfected in the owner by grant or any other species of assurance. And in support of this he cites Supreme Court decisions.

Mr. Speaker, I will reserve the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CRAIG].

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] says if there is a nigger in the woodpile, why do we not go after him? Gentlemen, I propose to go after him, and here it is. This Government comes here and asks for authority to the Attorney-General to do what? To declare a forfeiture of these lands, and the gentleman asks why the Attorney-General comes here? It is simply for this reason: In the case of an individual, as every lawyer knows, in order to take advantage of a breach of a condition subsequent to declaring a forfeiture, you must reenter the premises in some way. You must show some act of authority and possession over the property. The Government is the same as an individual. We must do something to show some authority, some act of possession in regard to this property. How can that be done? How could that be done? The Attorney-General can not do it, because the Constitution has lodged in Congress the power first to dispose of the public domain. Therefore Congress must take some steps to say that we reenter this property and take possession of it, and we authorize the Attorney-General, as the agency of this Government, to go forward and assert the rights of the Government.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CRAIG. I decline to yield.

Mr. KEIFER. I wanted to state to the gentleman that the provision of the resolution is just the reverse of his statement.

Mr. CRAIG. The resolution is not the reverse of my statement, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. KEIFER. Read it.

Mr. CRAIG. Now, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. ELLIS of Missouri. Before the gentleman proceeds, the gentleman wants to be fair. Refer to the language of the resolution.

Mr. CRAIG. I am referring to the language of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ELLIS of Missouri. I wanted to ask him to yield just to find what the language of the resolution is.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will protect the gentleman in his right to the floor. The gentleman has declined to yield.

Mr. CRAIG. I will answer him in my own time, Mr. Speaker. The resolution says:

That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to institute and prosecute any and all suits in equity, actions at law, and other proceedings which he may deem adequate and appropriate to enforce any and all the rights and remedies of the United States.

Mr. ELLIS of Missouri. Read what it says at the bottom of page 2, beginning with the semicolon:

Mr. CRAIG (reading):

It not being intended hereby to determine the right of the United States to any forfeiture or forfeitures.

No.

Mr. ELLIS of Missouri. That is it exactly.

Mr. CRAIG. We should reenter these lands as I have said. We would have to reenter before he, the Attorney-General, could bring his suit. Now, we come to some of the special interests, Mr. Speaker, who say that you shall not give the Attorney-General the right to proceed against them, but we may proceed only against the railroad companies. That I claim, Mr. Speaker, is as clearly unconstitutional as anything in this world can possibly be. The amendment says:

Provided, however, That this resolution shall not relate to any land for which patents have been issued, which are now held by bona fide purchasers, other than railroad corporations or persons holding title for any such railroad corporation as trustees to secure any bonded or other indebtedness, or for any purpose whatsoever.

The Supreme Court in the case of Missouri Railway v. Mackey (127 U. S., 209) said:

Special legislation is not obnoxious to the last clause of the fourteenth amendment, if all persons subject to it are treated alike under the same conditions.

I submit to you that there are two classes of bona fide holders contemplated in this amendment; one is excluded and the other included.

The equal-protection clause of the fourteenth amendment was designed to prevent the singling out of any person or class of persons as special subjects for discrimination and hostile legislation. (Pembina Mining Company v. Pennsylvania, 125 U. S., 188.)

Equal protection under the law means the same protection to all persons in the same place and under like circumstances. (Marchant v. Pennsylvania Railroad, 153 U. S., 389.)

Do you give the lumber company the same show that the railroad company gets under this amendment? You give them just so much better show that they will never be brought into the court.

Mr. FORDNEY. They will not, either, if they are bona fide purchasers.

Mr. CRAIG. Are they bona fide purchasers? That is the question we want to submit to the court. The gentleman from Michigan has made an argument as if he were arguing this question before a court. If there are any of the equities which the gentleman from Michigan says really exist, he ought not to fear to go into the courts of this country. [Loud applause.] But, Mr. Speaker, they are the worst scared innocent people I ever saw in my life. [Laughter.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. CRAIG. I have not the time. The gentleman would not yield to me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to be further interrupted.

Mr. CRAIG. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] says that ex-Senator Williams investigated the title and said it was absolutely good. Yes; he said it was aboslutely good. Let us see what he did say.

This brief was presented when the bill was before the Committee on Public Lands, and is signed by Mr. Williams's firm:

It might be argued that the last proviso of this act qualifies all that precedes it, and is, hence, a limitation upon the grant of 1866; but this is by no means convincing. If such was in fact the intent of Congress, it was certainly not expressed in clear and unmistakable language which we would have a right to expect. Besides, such a conclusion would seem to require an interpretation of the preceding portions of the act not warranted by their apparently plain and unambiguous terms. It is also contrary to what appears to be the settled construction of the Land Department which omits all reference to the act in the patents issued upon the grant.

That is what he says now. When a like bill was pending before the Senate on May 4, 1870, with just the same clause in it as in this bill of 1869, Mr. Williams said:

I suppose it is not necessary now to defend the policy that has been adopted by the Government to assist in the construction of railroads in new States by grants of land. Oregon is a State that has nearly 100,000 square miles within its borders. It has had one grant for a railroad, and now asks Congress to make another grant to assist in the construction of another small railroad in that State. The objection which the Senator makes to this bill is not available, for the reason that the bill provides expressly that every foot of the land shall be sold to actual settlers——

[Applause.]

The lands granted are as open, under the provisions of this bill, to actual settlers as they are under the preemption laws of the country. It simply provides that when settlers go upon these lands they may buy them of the company, and the proceeds shall be applied to assist in the construction of the road.

But, gentlemen, laying the two statements side by side, which are you going to take? When he wanted the grant he said that. When he wants to protect himself against the Government and the people of this country asserting their rights he says that those words do not mean a thing on the face of God's earth. [Applause.] Yet they say they are bona fide purchasers, and that is why they claim they are. They say they even went so far as to get the man who was here when the bill was passed to investigate the title. Gentlemen, why did they get that man? I leave that to your imagination. If they are purchasers without notice, why did they go to the man who passed the bill, and why do they rely on him now?

But they say these patents were issued under the act of 1866 and not under the act of 1869. Gentlemen, it would take three hours to explain all the intricacies of this matter to you, but as rapidly as I can I will tell you. There was a company, known as the "West Side Company," in Oregon, organized and designated by the legislature of Oregon to receive this grant. They filed their acceptance within the time required by law. Now, they went ahead and started the construction of their road. Another crowd out there in Oregon got hungry for this land and formed a corporation under the same name and started a railroad down on the east side of the Willamette Valley, and they began to contest with the other company the validity of their charter. In the meantime the one year in which they were to make the 20-mile extension of the road expired, so that the first company had nothing. They never did complete 20 miles of road, and the law required that they should complete 20 miles before they received any patent. They never built 20 miles, and therefore received nothing. The other company was not designated by the legislature to receive the grant until the act of 1868. Therefore they did not receive anything before 1869, when the amending act was passed, the consequence being, gentlemen, that at the time the act of 1869 was passed, these grants had been absolutely lost to the State of Oregon, and without it, even in spite of the act of 1866 and the act of 1868, they would not have received one foot of land. Therefore these grants come under the act of 1869, which has this provision in it limiting sales to actual settlers at a certain price and in limited quantities, thereby creating an express trust in the hands of the railroads; and I defy any lawyer in this House or anywhere else to show me a decision that says the statute of limitations ever runs against an express trust. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARSONS].

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, although the act of 1869, which was part of the grant, provided that the land should only be sold in tracts of 160 acres and for not more than $2.50 an acre, one of these lumber companies has 70,000 acres, all of it acquired in tracts greater than 160 acres, and at prices greater than $2.50 an acre, a very plain violation of the statute.

Mr. PERKINS. Did the company obtain that large quantity of land by one conveyance, or by purchasing a number of small conveyances to various grantees?

Mr. PARSONS. A number of conveyances were made to the company.

Mr. PERKINS. A number of conveyances, all to the one company.

Mr. PARSONS. And each conveyance was in violation of the statute. Each conveyance was for more than 160 acres.

Mr. PERKINS. And the various conveyances, in their total, amount to 70,000 acres.

Mr. PARSONS. The conveyances total 70,000 acres.

A great deal has been said about the effect of the patent which the Government issued, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] has laid great stress on the fact of the patent and has argued that these purchasers are protected because patents were issued. Now, the Government acted entirely properly when it issued the patents. It did not issue the patents to the purchasers. It issued the patents to the railroad company. As soon as the railroad company had built a certain number of miles of railroad the Government issued patents to it, and the Government has issued patents for two million and a half or more of acres, but the railroad has only sold, I think, six or eight hundred thousand acres. The conditions subsequent in the statute do not relate to the patents at all. They relate to the sale which the railroad company could make after it had received a patent.

Now, this matter comes down to this, that if you pass the amendment you may defeat the suit that the Government will bring. The Attorney-General fears that if you pass this amendment you will defeat the suit, and it will be useless to institute it, because in order to prove a forfeiture you must prove breaches, and this amendment would condone the breaches. And what would a court of equity say when you came to get a forfeiture decreed and yet you had condoned the breaches?

On the other hand, suppose you pass the resolution unamended. Then every one of these purchasers has full opportunity to set up all his equities and defenses. Every argument the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] has made can be set up in the proceedings brought by the Government. Every lawyer who appeared for any of these purchasers admitted, as did the Attorney-General and the special district attorney, that every one of these defenses could be brought up in the proceedings that may be instituted.

Mr. SULZER. Just in line with what my colleague was saying—why put these innocent purchasers to the expense of defending the suits that the Government may bring against them? Is not that a great hardship? Many of these purchasers are poor people.

Mr. PARSONS. It will not hurt any poor people.

Mr. SULZER. It will hurt innocent purchasers.

Mr. PARSONS. It does not hurt any poor people.

Mr. SULZER. An innocent purchaser may have to employ counsel to defend his case in court.

Mr. PARSONS. The Attorney-General said that as to the people who had purchased not in violation of the act no proceedings would be instituted against them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. PARSONS. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman have any doubt about the constitutionality of this proposed amendment, wherein it says that the resolution shall not apply to any bona fide purchaser "other than railroads and corporations, or corporations holding as trustees;" in other words, putting a human being on one side and saying that it shall not apply to him, but that it shall apply to corporations? Is that a constitutional provision or is it very doubtful?

Mr. PARSONS. I think it is doubtful.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And if it were to fall, that being a substantive part of the resolution, the whole resolution would be wiped out, and if we pass the resolution without the amendment, there will be no trouble for the court to go right along.

Mr. PERKINS. I should like to ask the gentleman another question, if he is willing to allow me to take his time.

Mr. PARSONS. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. As the gentleman knows perfectly well, the condition under which a forfeiture can be claimed is always inserted in the deed itself. Where there is a grant to a corporation under certain conditions—say, for church purposes, for instance—and upon failure, then it reverts. Now, the gentleman says that the Government gave its patents directly to the railroad corporation. Of course that is so; but should not the Government have inserted in the conveyance to the railroad corporation the condition upon which the forfeiture could be claimed, which would have been notice to everyone who took under it instead of giving a deed in such form that you must hunt through the statutes of the United States to see if perchance there is something there that restricts the full effect of this deed?

Mr. PARSONS. That really does not enter into this question for two reasons. One is, that the Booth-Kelly Company has 70,000 acres of this land, 10,000 of which comes from these patents which recite the last act and thus put them on notice of that limitation, and the second is that the brief or the opinion which is adverted to all the time is the opinion of Mr. Williams, who was attorney-general, and who was Senator from Oregon at the time the act was passed in 1869, and therefore these people knew of that act through him.

Mr. FORDNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARSONS. Yes.

Mr. FORDNEY. I want to say to the House that the opinion of Williams, Wood & Lithicum was given long after the lands were purchased, and not until that company discovered the limitation, long after the purchase of the land.

Mr. PARSONS. They had given another opinion several years before. Some or these purchasers, the one referred to by the gentleman from Michigan a little while ago, asked the Government about a year ago to institute a suit making them parties, so that their title could be determined, and when the Government institutes a suit everybody's title will be determined.

There is a peculiar vice about this amendment that I wish to call to the attention of the House. It provides that the resolution shall not relate to any land for which patents have been issued which are now held by bona fide purchasers. In other words, the purchaser only has to prove that he is a bona fide purchaser. It was argued by the lawyers who appeared before the committee that any purchaser, no matter if he knew what the provisions of the act of 1869 were, was a bona fide purchaser. Williams, Wood & Lithicum, in their opinion, argued that, although Mr. Williams was a Senator from Oregon and procured the passage of the act of 1869, the effect of this amendment would be to protect every purchaser. Now, I submit to the House that if there is a company that in plain violation of this statute has acquired 70,000 acres of land this House does not wish to adopt an amendment which, although that company's lawyer knew about the condition subsequent in the act of 1869, would declare that that company with 70,000 acres of land was a bona fide purchaser. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Michigan to use some portion of his time.

Mr. FORDNEY. How much time has the gentleman from Wyoming consumed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GAINES of West Virginia). The gentleman from Wyoming has forty-one minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Michigan has forty-four minutes remaining.

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not think we are quite ready on this side.

Mr. MONDELL. Then I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAMILTON].

Mr. HAMILTON of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, the proposition, as I understand, before the House is a simple one and one we should not permit to become clouded with legal contentions that are to be determined by the court.

The resolution that we have before us for consideration is one authorizing the Attorney-General of the United States to enforce the laws of a previous Congress. It simply gives him the authority to go into court and have the question determined whether or not the act of Congress has been violated. It does not give him any more authority. It does not enlarge the statutes upon which he is to bring this prosecution in any way whatever.

Mr. SULZER. Has he not got that right now?

Mr. HAMILTON of Iowa. I can not be interrupted, as I have only five minutes. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan can only be for the purpose of obstructing the prosecution upon the part of the Department of Justice as to violations of the provisions of law as contained in the grant.

If the contention made by him in his argument to this House be true, then, as it has already been stated, the party whom he represents as an innocent purchaser has nothing to fear from a court of equity. There can be no question as to that, if he is correct as to the legal proposition. The Department of Justice can only bring the parties into court that have violated the law and determine their rights. It is contended by the gentleman from Michigan that these parties may be put to a great deal of trouble when there is absolutely no question about their title. He is presuming that the Attorney-General of the United States does not know any law, and that he will bring actions and prosecutions under this resolution without any justification whatever. The presumption is that he will bring no action against anyone whom the facts show have title that can not be affected by the prosecution. If the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan is adopted and tacked on to this resolution I shall vote against the resolution, because it is far better for the Department of Justice to have no resolution at all than to have one with this amendment which, in my judgment, is placed here for the purpose of absolutely killing all of the virtue there is in the original resolution. [Applause.]

If by the act granting this land Congress meant what it said, then let us maintain the sanctity of the law. Why enact legislation as to the public domain in such manner as to protect it against the greed of corporations? If when the Department of Justice desires to enforce its limitations we place obstructions in its way, and thus make nugatory the solemn declarations of Congress, we hear precisely the same defense here that we have heard in this country for years. Whenever the Government starts out to prosecute a corporation, a man, or a set of men, on the ground that they have violated the laws of the country, we are told that we must stop these prosecutions or we will interfere with business or affect the property belonging to some poor widow or orphan who owns stock in the company. [Applause.] I for one shall cast my vote in favor of this resolution without any amendment, with dotting an "i" or crossing a "t," and saying to the Department of Justice, "You have a clear bill from the Congress of the United States to enforce the laws that a former Congress has enacted." [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I read in the newspapers recently that a very scholarly minister in Chicago wanted to go away over Sunday, and he was told that he could get a man from the center of Illinois to fill his pulpit for one meeting. He got a young man who brought down a very carefully prepared sermon on the subject of divorce. The Chicago divine said:

> My young friend, it will not do to discuss that matter in this church, because recently one of my very richest members secured a divorce.

The young man replied that he must discuss this, or rather preach that sermon, because he was not prepared to discuss any other subject, when the Chicago man said:

> Oh, attack corporate wealth. Corporate wealth has no friends in this church.

Now, I realize, Mr. Speaker, what we are up against here. All you have got to do, even in the face of the Congress of the United States, is to attack a corporation. Some weeks ago I received a letter from Oregon from a man who formerly lived in my district, who told me that his little home was threatened, and asked me if I could do anything for him as an old-time friend.

I telephoned over to the Committee on Public Lands and learned that that committee had made a report. I examined this report and wrote him that according to the language of that report there was absolutely no saving him and his little home was gone. A little while afterwards my attention was further called to the matter. I said, "Inasmuch as it is coming up in Congress I am going to look it over and discharge my duty as a Member of Congress," and I want to say to this House that I am not going to let any clerk in the Attorney-General's office, or any other officer of this Government, instruct me as to my duty. I know my duty and I propose to do it. I have examined this question for myself and I disagree very largely with gentlemen who are advocating the passage of this resolution, and I also disagree with some of my associates who are assisting in the passage of this amendment. I have my own views, and I know how lawyers disagree.

Let us go back very hurriedly, because my time is limited. We find that in 1866 the Congress of the United States in its wisdom made a land grant. I can not stop now to discuss whether that was wise or not. I do not propose to criticise my predecessors, but it is enough for us to know that they made a land grant. I think the report of the committee is wrong when it tells the country that there was incorporated into and made a part of that land grant a condition that no sale should be made as stated in the House.

I want to say to this House that there is no condition in that land grant anywhere, as far as this question is concerned. There was a condition with reference to the building of roads. There was a condition with reference to performing the contract. There was a reversionary interest which created a condition, and I want to assert now, if my few years of experience as a lawyer are good for anything, there is no condition; and if I were employed to-day by the people owning these lands I would say: "My friends, you have no more to fear than you have when you lie down to go to sleep." Every lawyer knows what a condition is, and whether or not it has been violated. I assert that there is no condition here at all, but I am perfectly willing, and I think it is the duty of this Congress, as far as lies in its power, to proceed against this railway company. I think we would be derelict in our duty if we did not proceed against this railroad company, but I am absolutely opposed to exercising the great power of this nation against those people who have innocently gone to work and bought those lands.

I can not be fooled with the seductive talk of the gentlemen who have been advocating the passage of this resolution when they say it does not jeopardize their interests. I do not agree with my learned friend from Alabama when he says that they can go into a court of equity, this honest settler, and have his rights protected. If a law student were answering those questions as I have heard it debated to-day, it would be said that he was not competent to be a lawyer. What is the proposition—that a court of equity has got to declare a forfeiture and that a court of equity will protect their interests? I know the gentlemen when they say it does not mean it. It is thrown in here in order to induce this House to defeat the amendment. A court of equity has nothing to do with these questions. A forfeiture is declared by the person who has the right to make a forfeiture, and I propose, if I can get the time, to call attention to the words of the resolution and the words of the report to verify my argument.

I want to say to-day that the railroad company is not in any danger under this resolution, and the learned Attorney-General will find he can not proceed against the company and that he has got to have further aid of Congress. Suppose to-day a person gave a deed to a party, and it was provided in the deed that no liquor should be manufactured or sold upon the premises and that if it was the land should revert to the grantor, his heirs, etc. It would rest entirely with the beneficiary to say whether or not he would insist upon the forfeiture. He could go into the possession of the land if vacant and unoccupied; if occupied he would have to bring his action in ejectment, and no lawyer would think of bringing an action in equity. There is nothing for a court of equity to act upon. You bring your simple action in ejectment and say we are entitled to the possession of that land because you have violated the condition upon which this land was granted. Therefore when you talk about a court of equity protecting these honest settlers, these innocent purchasers, I want to say to you, gentlemen, in all kindness, it is a fraudulent statement. A court of equity can not protect them for this reason.

The Congress of the United States declares a forfeiture; the courts do not declare a forfeiture. The courts enforce a forfeiture, and the Congress of the United States can say whether or not they will take advantage of the condition that is provided, if there is a condition. If the Congress of the United States exercises its right and its power and declares for a forfeiture, there is nothing left to do for the law officers of the Government but to go into the courts and have the forfeiture enforced. Now, how can an innocent purchaser be protected? I am very well aware, Mr. Speaker, that a large number of gentlemen who own some of this land are very wealthy men, but I do not know, under the Constitution, where this Government or any officer of this Government or the Congress of the United States has any right to take from a man property just simply because he is rich. I believe that in this nation every man is protected in his property rights and his personal rights without reference to whether he is rich or whether he is poor.

I would not be so influenced in my determination of that question. I want to know just exactly what is right and what is our duty now. They come in here and ask us to declare a forfeiture, and I want to say that the gentleman who drew this resolution never knew what he was about when he was drawing the resolution. His views are corroborated by the report of this committee. Look and see what they are talking about. I am willing to leave it to any lawyer in any section of the country, and it does not need a citation of authorities to sustain the position that the Congress of the United States has a right to declare a forfeiture, and we must determine, not the courts, whether a forfeiture or not exists. We must determine whether or not liquor has been manufactured or sold upon the premises, not the court. All the court can do is to put you in possession of your property if the condition has been broken. Now, look briefly at the resolution and see if I am not right, and then look at the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and I want to tell you to-day that the Attorney-General of the United States is just as helpless after the passage of this resolution as though it had never been passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. JENKINS. Now, if you will look at the resolution, it says, in short, that the Attorney-General is directed to commence suit. There is nothing to be gained by the commencement of a suit. What we have got to do, in the language of the law and the language of the Supreme Court of the United States, is to declare a forfeiture and insist upon the reinvestment of title. There is no such language in the resolution, and if you read the report you will discover that they are following along the lines of the resolution and saying that they are not going to declare a forfeiture; they are going to ask the court what their legal rights are. Then, after the court has established their legal right, they will determine what they can do. They will be out of court. I am saying this with all fairness with reference to proceeding against this railroad company, but they say a court of equity will protect these innocent purchasers. I regret to hear Members on this floor make any such argument. I want to know why the rights of innocent purchasers are not sacred and why we should, in the plenitude of our power, pass a resolution of forfeiture and say to the Attorney-General, "You proceed against these little homes out there and let these men spend all the money they have got in defending their rights."

Each man in possession has got to be proceeded against. Each man has got to put up this defense, has to employ a lawyer, and, as my very worthy friend suggested to me just now, he did not know, as he said, how you are going to ascertain whether they were bona fide purchasers. Why, we have an army of agents all over this nation, smelling out and ascertaining these matters, and they can go and investigate this matter. If they are satisfied that a man is not a bona fide purchaser, they can proceed against him. I wish I had time to take up these matters as they ought to be taken up, because it is an important question. I do not agree with my friend from Iowa when he says it is an absolutely simple question. It is not for us to put the machinery of this Government in motion and say that we will proceed against these people out there without knowing what our rights are and what their rights are. Now, when they say that it is unconstitutional, my friends, I want to say in all kindness to any gentleman that will advance any such argument, it is too small to talk about. We have a right to-day to say whether we will proceed against Mr. A or Mr. B.

If we have got any right at all, it is the right of forfeiture, and it is not class legislation. There is no class legislation about it. We are simply declaring that we will enforce a forfeiture, and when we make that declaration, it is all-sufficient for the Attorney-General to act, and he has got to go to work and act, and when one of those innocent purchasers comes in here and says, "I am an innocent purchaser for value," the court will have to strike his answer from the files and refuse to allow him to offer any evidence in support of his claim.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JENKINS. I would gladly yield if I had the time, but I have not.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that there is no equity in forfeiture—none at all. The question is whether the condition has been violated, and that calls to my mind, and my time being limited, I will go back to that question. What is a condition? It is nothing more nor less than a part of the contract which provides in certain events that title shall revert, and the way to determine it is to look at the provision and see whether there is any reversionary interest.

They did provide, if they did not build the road according to the terms of the grant, it should revert, but later, in 1869, they passed an amendment which simply provided that any railroad company organized under the laws of the State of Oregon could come in and avail themselves of the benefit of that grant, and said, "provided," and so forth. It was not a condition, I will say to my friends on the opposite side of this question, but a mere limitation that does not affect the title to this property. It simply says:

You can not sell in excess of $2.50 an acre, and 160 acres in all, and that to a bona fide settler.

Now, I say the Government has been derelict, and I do not sympathize with the argument that has been made by some of the gentlemen that the people——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield three minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. JENKINS. Now, I want to know, gentlemen, while we are disposing of this question, and a later Congress will say so, why we do not watch the rights of these parties? They now say that we will pass this forfeiture, we will direct the Attorney-General to go to work, we will spend millions of dollars in enforcing this forfeiture, and then later, when some poor settler has been deprived of all that he has got, and, as the man wrote me said, "My wife and I are pretty nearly crazy now," in ten or fifteen years from now they will be coming up here to this Congress and begging for replenishment. And you know how they will fare. A man had better be in the hospital with his back broken than to have an honest claim against the Government of the United States. [Applause.] And we know it.

Let us settle it now. We do not want to stand on the cold letter of the statute as against these men who bought, whether they are rich or poor. Let us do justice. Let us be fair in our operations, and we will command the respect of the people. Who is going to get this land? I thought when my friend from Oregon was talking how honestly he presented the question. Why, he said, when we get it the people are going to be benefited. The people? Well, we are the people. There is not a man here to-day that would be benefited by it. That is, you rob Peter to pay Paul. You say to that honest homesteader who thirty years ago bought that property and has made it his home ever since, has reared his family there: "You have got to get off of that property and come back in fifteen years and ask for some assistance from Congress." If Congress does not legislate with reference to this man, we all know what will happen to him.

Anybody can go in there, and one man may go there, the absolutely poor man or the wealthy man may go there, and occupy it as a homestead under the homestead laws, and get it. You are simply putting A out and putting B in. Talk about the people! That is all right in addressing a political assemblage, but you can not fool the people with any such cheap talk. The people are not going to be benefited. The great question here is whether this Congress shall authorize this power and say we will or will not proceed against these honest purchasers. But they say it will hurt our bill; it is unnecessary. To-morrow the man who makes that argument will be ashamed of himself. We simply here by this amendment say that we will not proceed against any person who is an innocent purchaser for value. [Loud applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, if the statute under consideration operated to work absolute forfeiture of this land to the United States without any election to declare a forfeiture, then I take it the Attorney-General would have the right to prosecute a suit to reclaim the land. It is said in the report of the committee that the sole object of this resolution is to confer more ample authority to invoke the remedy of forfeiture. If this resolution does that, it must do it either by declaring forfeiture or by authorizing the Attorney-General to declare forfeiture. It is always, I think, within the right of a vendor entitled to a forfeiture to waive the forfeiture. This is a resolution either to declare a forfeiture or to authorize the Attorney-General, as the agent of the Government, to declare a forfeiture. Now, whenever the right to declare a forfeiture accrues, a legal right to declare forfeiture, it is incumbent in morals upon the vendor to say whether he ought to declare a forfeiture or not. If, as stated here, this is simply authority to bring suit under a previous statute, I certainly would favor the resolution without amendment. But this is the exercise of an alleged right to declare a forfeiture or authorize the declaration of a forfeiture on behalf of the United States by the Attorney-General, and if there have been such acts as to legally authorize the United States to declare a forfeiture, then it is incumbent upon us to say whether in good morals the forfeiture ought to be declared or whether in good morals it ought to be waived. Shall we confer upon the Attorney-General authority to say that a forfeiture shall not be declared against a bona fide purchaser or shall we by this resolution declare such a forfeiture? That, in my judgment, is the real question pending before the House. If a forfeiture already exists, if the title is in fact revested in the United States, then I do not think the Attorney-General needs any additional authority; but if this be one of those cases in which the vendor must elect and declare forfeiture, then this resolution would not, in my judgment, accomplish its purpose. It is either a declaration of forfeiture, a delegation of the power to the Attorney-General to declare a forfeiture, or it is nothing.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I have only five minutes.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I would like to ask the gentleman what in his judgment, the resolution does accomplish?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I do not think the resolution accomplishes much in the way in which it is drawn; but this resolution is being considered upon the theory that it does something. If it does do anything, it is either to declare or authorize the declaration of a forfeiture.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What does the amendment accomplish?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The amendment is a declaration of Congress that if it has the right of forfeiture it will not declare a forfeiture as against bona fide purchasers, and the question is, Will we authorize the Attorney-General to declare a forfeiture?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It says any man to whom the patents have been issued. It does not say "bona fide."

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Does that mean all bona fide purchasers?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. All bona fide purchasers except railroad companies.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Then if a railroad company is a bona fide purchaser, it will not get the benefit of the provision.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It will not get the benefit of the provision, because it is well understood that these lands have been passed from one railroad to another, under reorganization schemes, until it does not seem feasible to protect them, as it does to protect outsiders. But, in my judgment, that constitutes no reason why this Congress should authorize the declaration of a forfeiture as against persons wholly disconnected with these railroad enterprises, who are bona fide purchasers of these lands.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Suppose a purchaser is a bona fide purchaser, whether a railroad or otherwise, I should like to know why we want to treat one bona fide purchaser differently from the way we treat another.

Mr. JENKINS. Because they may not be bona fide.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Oh, well, bona fide is bona fide.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I am not here to claim that an actual bona fide purchaser ought not to be protected, whether it be a railroad company or anybody else.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Then let us have one amendment that does that.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. The gentleman knows very well that under this programme there is only one amendment allowed; and I insist that if we have the power, this Congress ought not to exercise it by declaring a forfeiture as against bona fide purchasers for value without notice.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That is, you mean some bona fide purchasers.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOWLAND].

Mr. HOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, replying to the argument of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH], who has just taken his seat, I would call his attention to the reading of the resolution itself, which expressly provides that the thing which he is arguing against can not take place:

> It not being intended hereby to determine the right of the United States to any such forfeiture or forfeitures, but it being intended to fully authorize the Attorney-General in and by such suits, actions, or proceedings to assert on behalf of the United States and the court or courts before which such suits, actions, or proceedings may be instituted or pending to entertain, consider, and adjudicate the claim and right of the United States to such forfeiture or forfeitures, and if found to enforce the same.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Congress can not determine the right.

Mr. HOWLAND. This resolution is not asking Congress to exercise the right at all, but to refer it to a court of competent jurisdiction, where evidence can be submitted upon the question and a proper decision rendered. I am surprised, Mr. Speaker, that gentlemen on the floor of this House under the guise of speaking to an amendment to this resolution have attacked the resolution itself.

The resolution simply authorizes and directs the Attorney-General to enforce the existing rights of the Government, and the Congress can not afford to stultify itself by refusing to pass this resolution. And now, if you please, I wish to direct the attention of the House for just a moment to a matter which seems to have been lost sight of in this discussion, and that is the amendment itself. This amendment has been before the Committee on Public Lands for the last month or two, shaped up in substantially its present form by the best lawyers in this country, lawyers from Michigan, lawyers from Washington, lawyers from Pennsylvania, representing all of these interests, and it has been before the committee in every guise and shape except the one which is presented here to-day. Now, then, read it; and I want every Member of this House to read the amendment and see what it means.

Mr. FORDNEY. Is it not true that the committee and the Attorney-General have rejected every amendment offered, and that there have been many amendments offered to the committee?

Mr. HOWLAND. It is absolutely true that the Committee on Public Lands, of which I have the honor to be a member, has wisely rejected every amendment which your attorneys have submitted to that body [applause]; and we want the House to reject this amendment, because, in our judgment, it deprives the United States Government of rights which it now has, amounting to millions of dollars. [Applause.]

Now, I again direct your attention to this amendment, which is the product of the combined abilities of the best attorneys of the railroad companies, of the lumber companies, and other wise men that have appeared before our committee.

Mr. FORDNEY. I beg the gentleman's pardon. What authority has he to say that this amendment was framed by the railroad company?

Mr. HOWLAND. Because they have been working on these amendments for the last two months.

Mr. FORDNEY. There is no proof that the railroad company prepared it. The gentleman has no right or authority to make that statement, because it is not correct.

Mr. HOWLAND. I simply say that we have been considering these amendments submitted to us for the last two months, and every one they submitted to the committee has been rejected.

Mr. FORDNEY. I want to say to the gentleman——

Mr. HOWLAND. I can not yield any further, for I have only five minutes. I want to call attention to the amendment, which seems to have been lost sight of in the discussion of this matter. The amendment divides bona fide purchasers into two classes—lumbermen and railroad companies—and protects the one and not the other. It will also be observed that the words "without notice" are not in the amendment. They are not there, because the attorneys for the purchasers would not allow them to be put there. Again, the amendment says:

> Provided, however, That this resolution shall not relate to any land for which patents have been issued which are now held by bona fide purchasers other than railroad corporations—

Then place a comma right there, and the balance of the amendment brings the persons therein described under the same protection as bona fide purchasers.

That construction would be contended for, and the gentleman from Michigan knows that that construction would be contended for in the courts. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. HAMMOND].

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Speaker, the House should clearly understand that it is not the purpose of this resolution to deprive anyone—a railroad company or an innocent purchaser, or anybody else—of any legal weapon or any equitable shield that such a one may possess. This is simply a resolution authorizing the Attorney-General to go into the courts of the United States and in an appropriate manner attempt to secure for the United States its just and proper rights; nothing further is attempted. As has been suggested here, it may occur to lawyers that it would be better for the success of the suitor if a forfeiture were declared and suit begun upon that forfeiture. As a legal proposition I presume that that will commend itself to every lawyer in this body, but authorities are not lacking for the proceedings that the Attorney-General desires to institute—a judicial inquiry, an ascertainment of the rights of the Government, and then an effort to apply the appropriate remedy.

As I said before, it is not an attempt to take away from anybody any right that he has or any privilege that now exists in his favor. This resolution is merely an authorization to the Attorney-General and a direction that he institute and prosecute all suits in equity and all actions at law and other proceedings that he may deem adequate and appropriate to enforce the rights and the remedies of the United States. Is it so great a hardship to compel these gentlemen and these corporations who say that they are innocent purchasers to set up their claims in court as other people do? Is it not true that when a claimant to land comes into court and asks for a writ or seeks to recover the land by any legal process he makes other persons who have interests or claims in the land parties defendant, and is it considered a great wrong on his part or a great error for him so to do, and is it so great and so onerous a hardship to compel the defendants to prove their rights? Is the hardship so great and so onerous that the suit must not be brought for fear, forsooth, that they may have to engage an attorney to defend their claims in court? But suppose after this case has been tried the United States Government should be successful——

Mr STANLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes.

Mr. STANLEY. Is it not true that all these cases are on the same footing, and that one case would practically settle them all?

Mr. HAMMOND. That depends altogether upon the kind of action the Attorney-General brings. This resolution does not limit him to any one action or to any one kind of legal procedure.

Mr. STANLEY. The gentleman does not understand. As I understand, as far as the rights of the bona fide holders are concerned, would not one suit settle that, and not require an army of them to go into court?

Mr. HAMMOND. I am not prepared to say that there may not be different equities, and there may not be different defenses. I presume those who have patents may claim to be upon somewhat different footing than those who are in possession of land under contracts, and who have not yet received patents. But in general the principle, I suppose, upon which a recovery is gained, if one is gained, will govern all the cases.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I would inquire why the Attorney-General can not assert these rights now without the resolution?

Mr. HAMMOND. I am inclined to think the Attorney-General can assert them without the resolution.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Then why cumber the statutes with an unnecessary resolution?

Mr. HAMMOND. Because that is simply my opinion. The Attorney-General has come before Congress and has asked for this authority, and, in his opinion, it is of importance to him to have a direction and an authority from Congress in the institution of the inquiry that he proposes to make.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Will this authorize the Attorney-General to bring any suits, such as suits in equity, that he can not now bring? That is, does it confer any jurisdiction in equity over this subject that the court does not now have?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT].

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, this proposition of the Oregon land grants has been brought to my attention by some of the people who live in northern California immediately adjoining the Oregon line, principally people who are connected with the lumber business. Calling attention to the committee's report, it will be found that there have been patented 2,800,000 acres of land to the railroads, and there are 300,000 acres more still claimed. Of the patented land, the railroad company has sold approximately 813,000 acres, and this is the quantity of land that it is desired to protect by this amendment, to keep the owners of this land from needless litigation and from mixing their business all up, stopping their sawmills, and throwing that whole section of country into a mixed and demoralized condition. According to the provision that was put in the last railroad land grant, "Provided further, That the lands granted by the act aforesaid shall be sold to actual settlers only in quantities not greater than one quarter section to one purchaser, for a price not exceeding $2.50 per acre," there is not an acre of that whole 800,000 acres but what would be subject to litigation under the resolution unless the amendment is adopted.

The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY], in making an address on this subject a few days ago, said:

> As I have said, there are nearly 300,000 acres the titles to which, I understand, will never be questioned. I think they can not be questioned. There are some 500,000 acres sold in large quantities. Upon many of these large purchases sawmills have been erected, or they are the sources of log supplies for mills.
> Many mills have built expensive plants, including logging roads. They are valuable and flourishing industries.

He says later:

> The purchasers of lands in large quantities from the grantees universally assert their belief in the validity of their titles. If they are correct, they have nothing to fear in any event. It seems quite possible by stipulation to arrive at a speedy determination of any questions relating to their holdings. Should there be found any case or cases where for any reason the courts could not afford adequate relief, Congress can do so when specific information has been presented.

Now, gentlemen, I want to call attention to the fact that there is no necessity of Congress mixing up these people and their whole 800,000 acres of land until Congress has specific information on which to act. There are 2,300,000 acres of land which clearly come under this bill that are in the hands of the railroads. Let the United States Attorney-General go to work on that 2,300,000 acres of land, and when he gets specific information of anything wrong on the 800,000 acres that were sold, it is time enough to consider the rest. I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD].

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I think it is evident from what has been said in regard to this resolution that there are a good many lawyers upon this floor. It illustrates the fact that they do not usually agree. Now, let me call attention to just a few things in connection with this resolution. It is perfectly evident to me that there is good authority for this form of resolution. The Attorney-General believes that it is sufficient in form. I believe it is sufficient and believe that it is a much more favorable resolution to the parties who claim they are innocent purchasers than a resolution such as they recommend, because this resolution expressly says that it does not declare a forfeiture. What does that mean? It means this, that the Attorney-General can not commence a suit in ejectment which might deprive them of all equitable defenses, because the title which is vested under these deeds will not be revested until it has been determined in court that the United States is entitled to these lands. This makes it necessary that the United States go into a court of equity, as there the old familiar doctrine will apply that when a court of equity gets possession it will do full equity. The Attorney-General has said that he intends to bring a suit in equity. Everyone who has appeared before the Public Lands Committee has said without hesitation, friends or foes of this resolution, that they could have their rights thrashed out and the equities adjusted in a court of equity whenever the matter was brought before such a court. The resolution is drawn with that idea in view. Allow me briefly to call attention to the amendment which is offered in this case. It is not a fair amendment. It does not place all parties on the same footing. Why should we treat one class of citizens differently from another class? The fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States as applied to the States provides there shall be equal protection to all. Why single out a few? Let all these men stand on the same footing, exempt none from obedience to the act. Those who have obeyed the act are protected because the Supreme Court of the United States has held that purchasers in obedience to the act are protected, so far as they are concerned no one need concern himself. There is no occasion to plead for the widows and orphans in this matter. They are nearly always brought in whenever you attack any illegal act, especially when you attack a corporation. My friends, here is a plain wrong, here is a plain outright violation of the statute. There is no question about that. It seems to me under the circumstances we ought not to hamper the Government in enforcing whatever rights we have under the law. [Applause.] It seems to me perfectly plain in this instance that they are expecting to gain an advantage by this amendment, and there is no doubt in my mind they will get a substantial advantage if it does pass, but not the advantage that they claim. If this amendment goes on the burden of proof is shifted from the parties now claiming under the deeds to the United States so that the United States would have to show the fact that these parties are not innocent purchasers. The present claimants could make it almost impossible to show that. It does another thing. This amendment distinctly recognizes that there are innocent purchasers. Under the circumstances there can be no bona fide purchasers as I understand the law. The Attorney-General says that in his view there are no bona fide purchasers, but if this language goes in the Congress of the United States has distinctly recognized that there is a class of bona fide purchasers. This would change the law as applied to these lands. In 1896 an act was passed legalizing certain conveyances.

In a case construing the act the Supreme Court said that because Congress had used the expression "bona fide purchasers" where there were none in fact, it had given a different meaning to that expression, and there is no doubt in my mind if that amendment becomes a part of the resolution the Supreme Court, or whatever court administers the law in this case, will have to hold that Congress changed the law and recognized a class of purchasers as bona fide which, under the law, are not such. It does not seem to me, gentlemen, that we ought at this time to undertake to try this lawsuit, and it does not seem to me that we ought to try to give any one class of litigants any greater rights than another class of litigants. Let us be fair about it and give to every man the same rights. Why, these parties who have come before us and pleaded with us, though they have always asked to get some protection, have at the same time insisted that the courts would protect them. They remind me of the man who was arrested for a crime. He was talking with a friend about it and seemed pretty anxious. His friend finally asked him the name of the judge who was going to try the suit. He was told that it was so-and-so, when his friend replied: "You do not need to be afraid, because that man is perfectly fair; he is going to give you justice." "Well," he answered, "that is just what I am afraid of." And that, it seems to me, is just what these fellows are afraid of. They can get justice in the courts of the United States, and that is all they have a right to do. Let us not take away from the Government any right which it has at present. When the time comes, when these lawsuits have been tried, if this land reverts, then all right; we can adjust it. We have the right to do it. And then we will have all the facts, all the circumstances, before us, and we will know the equity of each particular claimant under these deeds. Now we do not know. Many of those corporations that may be protected under this amendment may be owned practically by these same railroads, and still would be protected by it. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I was very much astonished a while ago to listen to my learned friend, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS], who stated that the court, under this proposed resolution, without this amendment, would have no right to declare forfeiture. That is a mistake. The Department of Justice has passed upon this resolution through Attorney-General Bonaparte. Mr. TOWNSEND, who is a very able lawyer, has been employed in this matter for the last eighteen months, and is very much in favor of the Senate resolution and very much opposed, I may add, to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY]. Now, then, Congress itself can declare a forfeiture or can authorize a court to declare a forfeiture. The latter is exactly what this resolution provides. After a court of conscience, after the Supreme Court of the United States finds the facts in favor of the Government of the United States, the court will then have jurisdiction to proceed to a forfeiture if the facts warrant that.

Now, gentlemen, what an absurdity it is, what an absolute absurdity it is, for a lot of "innocent purchasers" to say that that great court in yonder is going to rob them of their land! That is a reflection upon that great tribunal.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] hoots at the idea of these propositions of law, but here in the case of The United States v. The Northern Pacific Railroad Company the Supreme Court of the United States (177 U. S. Reports) distinctly recognizes that the Congress itself can declare a forfeiture, which is not this case, or it can arm the court to do so under this resolution. And all in the world that the Attorney-General is asking here to-day is for authorization for him to go forward and cause to be found all the facts—find them in favor of the railroad, find them in favor of the Government, find if there are any innocent purchasers, and point out what their rights are and who they are, and let the great courts of this country settle those rights under the existing law.

Mr. Chairman, I have not time, of course, to read all that opinion, but I will hand it to my friend from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], whom we all know is a good lawyer.

The court in part lays the law down thus:

> That lands granted by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads do not revert after conditions are broken until a forfeiture has been asserted by the United States, either through judicial proceedings instituted under authority of law for that purpose or through some legislative action legally equivalent to judgment of office found at common law, etc.

Why, my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] talks about some widow in Wisconsin writing to him. I want to say to him that some of the Representatives from the State of Washington have been written to about this matter. I will ask the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JONES] if he has been written to about this matter? Or I will ask his colleague [Mr. HUMPHREY] if he has been written to, to favor this amendment?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I have been written to about the amendment—against it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Were you urged to vote against Senate resolution 48?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; I was not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Are you, as a neighbor of Oregon, in favor of Senate resolution 48?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I favor the resolution, without amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Here we have the case of the widows of Wisconsin, who have homesteads to spare, urging their Members to stand by Harriman and his gang of land grabbers and thereby continue to deny the chance to have homesteads to the Oregon and Washington widows, who have not where to lay their heads. [Applause.] Shall we turn a deaf ear to their appeals and the voice of law and justice? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA].

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. Speaker, this resolution ought to have careful consideration. The property that this resolution affects is worth a great amount of money. I have talked with men from the State of Oregon, men who know the value of these lands, practical people, and they have repeatedly told me that the amount of money involved in these lands is from thirty to fifty million dollars.

I want to say, as a member of the Committee on the Public Lands, it was not our intention to discriminate against anyone, but treat all interests fairly, whether it was a corporation or individuals, so long as the law has been complied with; and for that reason I must say that I am strongly opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan, because I believe if a corporation is an innocent purchaser, has acquired property honestly and not contrary to the provisions of law, under the Constitution of the United States they would have as much right to their property as an individual. The law provides that the land shall be sold to actual settlers at a price not to exceed $2.50 per acre and not to exceed 160 acres to any one settler. The corporations have known at all times that they have disposed of this land directly and clearly in violation of this law. There has been transfer made of as much as 45,000 acres of land by the railroad companies to one purchaser, and, let me say, the patents have not been issued to what you call "innocent purchasers," but the patents have been issued to the railroad companies.

Congress, by the act of 1866, granted lands for the building of railroads, 20 miles on each side of the railroad. Each alternate section, or 12,800 acres, at $2.50 an acre, or $32,000 per mile, was given as a subsidy to these corporations; but there was a limitation placed upon that—how it should be disposed of—namely, that of the price and the number of acres. These corporations have, in violation of this law, disposed of this land in large tracts and at prices far in excess of the price provided by law.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of this House, that the attorneys who appeared for the lumber companies, each and every one of them, appearing before the Committee on Public Lands, admitted that nothing will be taken away from them if this resolution is passed. The Committee on Public Lands heard all the parties that wanted to be heard. We have not heard a single complaint from any small holders of this land, who have so often been referred to as "innocent purchasers," who are in possession of 160-acre tracts. The only people that have complained to the committee are the large corporations, who seem to fear something will be taken away from them. But the attorneys for these companies have admitted themselves that nothing will be taken away from them should this resolution, without any amendment, be passed. I therefore say, Mr. Speaker, that it is fair to the small holders and to the large holders, and I am strictly opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan, because it is discriminatory and would practically nullify the act.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has twelve minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman exhaust the balance of his time?

Mr. FORDNEY. I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER].

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, in that time I shall not undertake to discuss this question, though it is a grave one. I have listened with a great deal of astonishment to the various statements made here in reference to this resolution. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CRAIG], trying to put his opposition on the right ground, stated that the resolution gave to the courts power to treat the United States entering upon these lands, which he says is essential to the right of the United States to maintain any of the suits to recover any lands. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH], speaking on the same side of the question, repudiated that, rightfully. The resolution only undertakes to authorize suits based on existing conditions. Then on the same side of the question other gentlemen seemed to think that the resolution said that the courts, if they are to get jurisdiction at all under this resolution, ought to get it upon defaults condoned. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PARSONS] says that the amendment would not do, because that in itself is an admission that there was some condoned fault, and in that state of the case would leave no right of action against anybody. Whoever heard of such an absurdity? It is only the condoned faults of the party to be affected by the judgment to be rendered. Take the great case decided only two years ago of the United States against the Detroit Lumber Company and another corporation, where they were dealing with precisely this question. That case will be found reported in volume 200, United States Reports, page 321.

In that case the Supreme Court of the United States held that the Detroit Lumber Company was an innocent purchaser from the Martin & Alexander people, who had acquired the title under patents, and the court refused to set aside the title to the Detroit Lumber Company, but set aside the patents to seventeen tracts held by the other corporations. Well, what is the situation here? The resolution speaks about forfeiture being declared by a court of equity. Whoever heard of such a thing before? Courts of equity in all time have not sat for the purpose of declaring forfeitures. They declare, in a case like this, whether or not the title remains in the party having it, as they did in the case of the Detroit Lumber Company.

It is admitted that there was no defect in the title of these railroad companies, originating anterior to the issue of the patents. Is there anybody who denies that? Were not the patents clean and clear of any fault or fraud, or anything affecting their integrity at the time they were issued in each of these cases?

Mr. MONDELL. In what way could the Government determine in advance of the sale of the land by the railroad company that it intended to violate the terms of the grant?

Mr. KEIFER. We are not dealing with intentions. The Supreme Court of the United States, every time it has reached the question, has said that you must deal with the patent, as to whether or not it was void or valid; and if it was valid when issued, that ends it. The gentleman says, "How did you know until some time after whether the company intended to violate the terms of the grant?" How did you know until some time afterwards whether the Government intended to rob the party of the deed?

Mr. MONDELL. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that this is a condition subsequent?

Mr. KEIFER. As it was in the act of 1866, with reference to the railroad company carrying soldiers, if they failed they were to pay the penalty, and it did not defeat their title at all. A condition subsequent is a different proposition, unless it is a condition that when violated causes the title to revert to the original owner. There is no such provision here and no cause for it.

Mr. MONDELL. If the patents are good and unassailable, then why need anybody be disturbed?

Mr. KEIFER. They need not be disturbed. And let me say that except for the cry that some corporations are going to catch the very devil by this resolution, there would not be a lawyer on the floor of this House who would think of voting for it. Nobody will ever lose any land under this, I agree. Titles are not thus divested. If you will take the cases of the United States against the Detroit Lumber Company and others already mentioned, you will see that the patent is a protection forever and ever, if it is issued honestly and delivered fairly, even to those who acquired only an equitable title before the date of issue. The great trouble in that case was as to the rights of the parties who had acquired title before the issue of the patent; but the courts say that when it is issued, and is unassailable for anything that occurred prior to that time, then it shall stand.

Mr. PARSONS. In the Detroit Lumber Company case was not the question whether there was fraud before the patent issued?

Mr. KEIFER. Yes; exactly so. There was just that question in that case, and the court found there was no fraud before, and that there could not anything happen afterwards that would wreck the title; that the title vests absolutely on an unassailable patent. The gentleman is perfectly right. There was no fraud before the patents issued to invalidate them. The corporations had a right to convey the lands, and innocent purchasers under them should be protected. The attempt was made in the Detroit lumber case to prove that the lumber company had antecedent contracts, and the circuit court of the United States in its finding of facts said that there were no antecedent contracts. They drew a very fine bead, and said there was some expectation, but not sufficient to constitute a fraud that would defeat their title.

The amendment should be adopted to protect bona fide purchasers from vexatious and expensive lawsuits, which in the meantime throws a cloud on their title. No provision is made even to reimburse these innocent parties the money they have paid for their lands. What sort of equity would be administered if the courts were to take these innocent parties' lands and not give them back the purchase money they have in good faith paid?

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to set myself right here and not be misunderstood in a statement that I made during my remarks. I referred to an Assistant Attorney-General, who might be a cheap skate, and so on. What I had in mind was this: First let me say to you that the gentleman representing the Government who appeared before this committee, Mr. Townsend, is an able and courteous gentleman. I had no reference to any man now in office; but if this resolution becomes a law this litigation will no doubt go on and on for five, ten, or fifteen years, and there is no telling who may represent the Government in the litigation with the parties holding title from the railroad companies. So do not misunderstand me.

Some gentleman over there stated that this amendment had been carefully prepared by the best legal talent employed by the railroad company. He would not permit me to interrupt him further, but I want to say, and I do not wish to be misunderstood, that this amendment was prepared in my office, dictated by gentlemen representing the interests of the land involved in this resolution, and that no attorney representing any railroad company affected ever stepped his foot in my office, or ever dictated a single word in that amendment.

Mr. HOWLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. HOWLAND. Will the gentleman read for the benefit of the House what he stated before the Committee on Public Lands and printed in these hearings?

Mr. FORDNEY. That is not my amendment; that amendment was prepared by Mr. Brown, of Britton & Gray, and that is not this amendment. The committee rejected that amendment.

Mr. HOWLAND. It is substantially the same thing.

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, I differ from the gentleman. Mr. Brown had nothing to do with preparing this amendment.

Mr. HOWLAND. Why did not the gentleman put in the amendment "without notice?"

Mr. FORDNEY. Because I did not propose to let you dictate what should go into the amendment. Let me state another important matter in reference to this resolution. If this resolution becomes a law, it will put a cloud on the title of every acre of land that has ever been conveyed by this railroad company to anybody. Let me read you a clipping from a Detroit paper that I received a day or two ago, which shows just what will happen if this resolution becomes a law:

Railroad land grants being opened up for settlement. Railroad company being forced by the courts to convey valuable timber and farm lands to settlers at $2.50 per acre, worth from $3,000 to $5,000 per quarter section. Come at once. Do not send any money, but make personal application.

A MEMBER. Good!

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; good for gentlemen who would not do justice between man and man. The gentleman from Washington says that he has not received any letters from anybody protesting against this resolution, but that he did get a letter protesting against this amendment. Now, gentlemen, this amendment was never made public until last night. Where in the devil did he get his letter from? [Laughter.] Here are letters and telegrams laid before the Committee on Public Lands, pages 74, 75, and 76, and there is a long line of telegrams, one from the chamber of commerce in Portland and some from boards of trade, all of which protest against the resolution. Now, let me say that this is the most peculiar predicament to put a committee in. Here is a bill reported on the 11th day of February, recommended by that committee to confirm the title to land of lumber concerns in the Territory of New Mexico purchased in direct violation of the law, well known to be so to the purchasers and to the Territory of New Mexico, and yet this committee recommends the confirmation of the title to the timber on those lands to all of these purchasers. This resolution proposes absolutely the reverse. Let me show you what a predicament you put yourselves in, in my estimation, and I can best illustrate it by giving you the story of the old quack root doctor.

He was called to see a boy who had chills and fever. He scratched the bark off a root and put some in one glass of water and some in another, and said to the mother, "Give this in this glass for the chills and give this in the other glass for the fever." She said, "But, doctor, it is exactly the same in both glasses." He said, "Oh, not at all." "But," she says, "I saw you scrape the bark off the same root and put it in each glass." "Yes," says the doctor; "but you didn't see how I done it, my dear lady. This for the chills I scrape up on the root, and that makes it high-cockalorum. This for the fever I scrape down on the root, and that makes it low-cockahighrum." [Laughter.]

In this case the Committee on Public Lands makes their prescription high-cockalorum in both cases. You prescribe, my dear friends, meat for one and something else for the other. How do you come to your conclusion? How, in the name of all that is just, can you bring your consciences together to confirm the title to lands purchased by men who knew what they were purchasing was purchased in open violation of law and——

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, no. I know what the gentleman is going to say. He has time in his own right.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will yield, but I have very few minutes remaining.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The gentleman expressed the opinion that the Government had no case whatever, and now he says that he will vote against the resolution because he fears so many innocent people would be dragged into court.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. And that was the only purpose of the gentleman in opposing the resolution?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, no; that is the principal purpose.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Would not one case tried in the court settle that whole thing?

Mr. FORDNEY. No; not at all, because here are 2,500 men who have purchased strictly in compliance with the law, and the balance have purchased in quantities in violation of the law. How are you going to put them on the same footing?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Would not the question of forfeiture be settled in a test case?

Mr. FORDNEY. If the Government is going to forfeit it all, that is my contention; but let me go on. In the Booth-Kelley Lumber Company case that company found it necessary to get funds to carry on its business and improve its property. It sold some of my constituents a large interest in its property. That company found it necessary, I say, to borrow money. They bonded their property and made the Detroit Trust Company, of Detroit, Mich., the trustee for $750,000 worth of those bonds. The trust company undoubtedly has passed them out into the hands of investors in that city and in that vicinity. Take away the title to those lands, and every dollar's worth of value of security back of those bonds is destroyed. The gentleman referred to widows and orphans. I say to you that there is a widow in my home town who lost her husband about a year ago, and two-thirds of all the property that she has in the world is involved in the title to those lands. You take away that from her and she has no recourse against the railroad company, because that company transferred by a special warranty or a bargain and sale deed, and it does not guarantee that title beyond the company's own acts.

I know of another widow who has $15,000 worth of this Booth-Kelley Lumber Company bonds. Take away the 67,000 acres of those lands held by that company and you have taken from under her bonds all security whatever except the moral obligation of the officers of that company. No legal obligation is placed upon any man connected with that concern for the payment of those bonds. On the other hand, here are a great many concerns that have purchased lands in large quantities from the railroad company and built sawmills, railroads, and built up farms. Are you going to destroy that title and take it away from them? Why do not you proceed as you ought to? Why do not you go into court and ask to bring into that court the guilty parties, not the purchasers but the railroad company, who sold those lands in violation of the law, and knew they were selling the lands when the individual knew nothing about it.

Mr. JENKINS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. JENKINS. As far as this question of bona fide purchaser is concerned, I want to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that it has come to his knowledge recently that the Government has bought over 25,000 acres of this land for a forest reserve and passed the title, and that was done by these very same gentlemen who are now insisting on this forfeiture.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; for the benefit of some gentlemen who may not have been on the floor when I referred to that part I will state that the Government took from the Booth-Kelley Lumber Company in one transaction, in one deed, 9,000 acres of land purchased by the Booth-Kelley Lumber Company from the railroad company, and passed upon that title and pronounced it absolutely correct.

Mr. JENKINS. And paid for it?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; and in exchange for the 9,000 acres gave to the Booth-Kelley Lumber Company lands elsewhere, or what we might call a scrip, or a right that could be transferred to an individual to select a like number of acres anywhere; and if the title to the 9,000 acres was good, why not, my friend, say that the title to the balance of it is good, because when the Booth-Kelley Lumber Company purchased from the railroad company, it purchased in quantities contrary to the terms of the act of April 10, 1869?

In all fairness I say to you, consider what is just as between man and man, and I ask nothing more.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] asked how it was that I was able to state that I had received dispatches and letters opposing this amendment, when his amendment was not made public until last evening. I will tell the gentleman with a great deal of pleasure. I received letters and dispatches and resolutions, saying that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] would offer an amendment intended to protect the railroads and the lumber interests from prosecution.

Mr. FORDNEY. That was wrong, was it not?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. And the moment I read the amendment offered by the gentleman I recognized it from that description. [Applause.]

Mr. FORDNEY rose.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No; I will not yield, because I have only two minutes. I deny that any bona fide purchaser from the Pacific coast is insisting on this amendment. The tearful plea of the gentleman from Michigan has been wasted. If the bona fide purchaser is in fear of this resolution, why were not the Members from the Pacific coast told of that fact? Has any protest come to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY], in whose district most of this land is situated, upon this proposition? None whatever.

It is not a remarkable fact that these innocent purchasers have to go so far from home to find some one to defend them. I will tell you who is opposing this resolution; those who are here urging this amendment. The report itself throws a flood of light upon that proposition. I will read two or three sentences from that report:

Commencing about the year——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. In that time I can not read what I desire, so I shall only read this much:

Commencing with about the year 1895, however, there was a sudden demand for these lands in large quantities by the wealthy timber men of the Middle States. In absolute disregard and disobedience of the terms imposed by Congress, the railroad company took advantage of its opportunity and commenced to dispose of the grants to these parties in large quantities, ranging from 10,000 to as high as 45,000 acres to a single purchaser and at rapidly increasing prices. During this period the railroad company sold approximately 363,000 acres of land to thirty-eight purchasers, an average of 10,000 acres to each of these purchasers.

These are the people who want us to declare their innocence in advance; these are the poor innocent purchasers who want us to throw some obstruction between them and the prosecution of the Government. These are the men that want this amendment. If you pass this resolution no innocent person will be injured, and I ask you to vote down the amendment so that no guilty person may escape. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I just have a few minutes and in that period of time I want to say what the conclusions of the committee were. I will not have the time to do more, but I want that understood by this House. The grants under which the title of these lands were granted contained three express limitations. One was that they could not sell more than 160 acres to any one man; the second was that they could not sell the land for more than $2.50 an acre, and the third was that they could not sell except to actual bona fide settlers. Those three provisions were in the grants. The people who seek to modify this resolution by this amendment are not people who own 160 acres of land and are not bona fide settlers—are not purchasers who even attempted to keep within the terms of the grant, but in open violation of it instead. One sale contains 90,000 acres; one contains 45,000 acres; another body of land embodies 360,000 acres, which was all sold in more than 2,000 acres in each tract. No attempt to comply with the law; no respecter of the grant. Now, I am not one who condemns these people because they have more than 160 acres of land. I am not one of those citizens that condemns them because they have capital and are extensively engaged in the lumber business; but I am one citizen who thinks that they should comply with the law, and when they deal in the face of the law they should be brought to time, and the resolution gives the Attorney-General authority to do it. [Applause.] This amendment that was offered by the gentleman from Michigan simply hamstrings the original resolution. I have nineteen members of the Committee on the Public Lands, who have been conducting hearings for two months, to back my proposition; I have the Attorney-General's office of the United States to corroborate my statement; I have the gentleman from Oregon, the gentleman from Washington, and, in fact, the whole Pacific delegation to vouch for the truth of my statement. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say when this proposition first came up for consideration I received some telegrams from people in my State urging me to insist that some amendment should be inserted in the resolution protecting bona fide purchasers. That sounded very good to me, but when I began to look into the matter further the difficulties became greater, and I appeared before the Public Lands Committee and listened to the representative of the Attorney-General's office, and became satisfied from his statement before that committee that the insertion of any amendment of this character upon this resolution would very greatly injure the proceedings desired to be instituted by the Government of the United States, and it has seemed to me that the interest of the few in this case must be subservient to the interest of the people of the entire country. [Applause.]

There is no doubt but that many of these purchasers were acting in perfect good faith and supposed that they were acquiring a good title. Their interests should be protected, but we should not sacrifice the far greater interests of the public in order that these should be protected in their equitable rights. There can be no question anyhow but that they will be fully protected in their equitable rights by the courts and by Congress by such legislation as may be necessary in order to do full justice.

What is the situation? The people, through Congress, granted to these railroads a large tract of land upon the express condition that such lands should be sold only to actual settlers and in quantities not greater than 160 acres and at a price not exceeding $2.50 per acre. What was the purpose of these limitations? Settlement. The building up of the country by the establishment of homes. This was a most desirable purpose and one for which Congress could afford to grant these lands. Under this grant 2,800,000 acres have been actually patented to the company, which, at the price fixed in the act, would be equivalent to a grant of $7,000,000. Of this the company has actually sold about 800,000 acres, of which about 127,000 acres were sold in compliance with the law, and the remainder was sold in violation of the law, either in price or quantity. Nearly half of it has been sold to about thirty-eight purchasers, or, on an average, almost 10,000 acres to each purchaser.

Most of the patents have been issued and most of the lands have been sold since 1895. When times became good, the lust for gold brought an utter disregard for the law upon the part of the railroad company and by those who hoped to multiply their investments. The issuance of patents was hastened on the part of the company, and thousands of acres were purchased by those who saw a large return. It is said that these purchasers bought in good faith, believing that they were acquiring a good title and upon the best of legal advice. I do not know what the stipulations of the patents are, but if they refer to the acts under which they are issued, and they surely do, then the attorneys consulted certainly did not do their duty by their clients in not calling their attention to the terms of the statute, which are so plain that the laymen can easily understand.

The plain letter of the law has been grossly violated by the company, and it must have been done knowingly. The law has been violated by the purchasers, possibly unwittingly. They have not paid the price nor purchased the quantity required by law, nor are they actual settlers. If this were all, however, there would be no difficulty in dealing with the situation.

This company holds 2,000,000 acres undisposed of under this grant. It absolutely refuses to sell any part of it in any amount for any price to settlers or otherwise. Despite the plain terms of the law, it proposes to hold these lands in order to reap the values which the future development of the country shall bring about. After the hardy and industrious settlers have, through untiring effort, settled and cleared and cultivated the other lands of this great State and added millions to the values of these lands, then this company proposes to bring to its own coffers this great increase. This is the policy that has angered the people against many of these large corporations. This is the policy that will engulf the honest and fair-dealing corporation along with the lawbreaking and law-defying corporation. This is the policy that should meet with strongest condemnation on the part of this House.

This resolution proposes to assert the rights of the people in these lands and to enforce the terms of the grant under which the company holds these lands. This amendment proposes to protect certain bona fide purchasers. What would be its effect, if adopted? Would it do nothing more than this? If not, we could well afford to adopt it; but the law officer of the Government who has investigated this subject in all its phases told the committee that, in his judgment, if any amendment of this kind should be adopted, the rights of the Government would be greatly jeopardized and probably entirely lost and very likely the entire resolution nullified. This House can not afford to run this risk. We can not afford to take the chance. The interests of the few must give way to the far greater interests of the public. These few innocent purchasers must appreciate the justice of this position and approve such a course. Those who are innocent purchasers, those who have acted in entire good faith, can well trust to the equity of the courts and the justice of the Government to see that they are treated fairly, and will not complain that their claims are held in abeyance until the far greater interests of the public are protected.

If the title of these purchasers is good now, it will not be affected by these proceedings. If it is not good, then they are not entitled to confirmation by act of Congress, and that seems to be what they desire. If the grant to the company is forfeited, these purchasers will still have the right to present their equities for the consideration of the courts, and if legislation is necessary to do full justice, there is no doubt it will be enacted.

This amendment is unfair in its very terms. It proposes to except bona fide purchasers other than railroads. Why this exception? If there is a bona fide railroad purchaser, it is just as much entitled to protection as anyone else. This simply emphasizes the real purpose of this amendment and the lengths to which those interested will go in order to secure their own selfish ends.

Let us be fair, let us be just, and let us see to it that the interests of the whole people whom we are supposed to represent shall not be sacrificed by the adoption of an amendment which by its very terms would exclude certain bona fide purchasers.

Gentlemen, this House can not afford to vote down a proposition that tends to give to the officers of this Government the authority to enforce, uphold, and maintain the majesty of the law that we have passed. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has three minutes remaining.

Mr. MONDELL. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH.]

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. My long service on the Public Lands Committee and the care and thought that I have given to this particular case I felt would justify me in saying something to the House about it. But by the limitation of time under the rule, you know that this is impossible. I am making no complaint of the chairman, because I know what demands are made on him for the small time allowed for consideration of this bill. But in that brief time I will declare that this resolution will hurt no honest man. [Applause.] Every innocent purchaser is protected, as shown, by every argument made here against this resolution. Why these "innocent purchasers" are so sorely alarmed by its provisions is for this House to decide. Do they doubt their own innocence? Every safeguard is thrown around the honest innocent purchaser of these lands. The adoption of the amendment proposed will destroy the purpose of the resolution. I agree heartily with every statement made by the gentlemen who have just preceded me, and I indorse their conclusions. The railroad company, in the sale of these lands, has defied the very law under which they acquired them, and the rich lumber companies who bought from them will have some difficulty in showing bona fides in the transaction. If they can, well and good; if they can not, they ought to lose. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, in the two minutes of time remaining it will be impossible for me to sum up this case, but I want to say just a word in regard to it, and that is that the Public Lands Committee, which has had charge of this matter, has heard no complaint from any actual settler or small owner relative to this resolution; that it was claimed by one of the most able attorneys that appeared before the committee on behalf of the large purchasers from the railroad company that in the suits contemplated by this resolution in a court of equity all the rights and equities of his clients would be considered, and that, whatever else might be done, the court must, whatever its judgment might be with regard to the holding railroad company, save the rights and consider the equities of all bona fide and innocent purchasers.

We believe, Mr. Speaker, that this proposed amendment would absolutely nullify the proceeding under the resolutions, and we believe that no greater harm could come to the so-called "innocent purchasers" from the railroad company than to have this amendment adopted, for the result would quite likely be to leave their rights and their interests in jeopardy at the close of the proceedings had, as they are to-day. The innocent purchaser is protected in all his rights and property under this resolution. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY].

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 44, nays 228, answered "present" 11, not voting 104, as follows:

RAILROAD TRACKS TO WASHINGTON NAVY-YARD.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill H. R. 13844.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13844) to authorize and require the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company to maintain and operate a track connection with the United States navy-yard in the city of Washington, District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company be, and it is hereby, authorized and required to maintain its track conection with the United States navy-yard in the city of Washington, D. C., by means of a single track on K street and Canal street SE., either as at present located or as the same may hereafter be relocated, in whole or in part, with the approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and to continue the operation thereof for a period of two years from April 28, 1898, anything contained in any prior act or acts of Congress to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee demands a second. A second is considered as ordered under the rule.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I ask that the report on this bill be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] has twenty minutes and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] has twenty minutes. The report will be read in the time of the gentleman from Michigan.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 13844) to authorize and require the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company to maintain and operate a track connection with the United States navy-yard in the city of Washington, D. C., report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

This bill proposes to extend the time for the removal of the railroad track leading into the United States navy-yard in the city of Washington for a period of two years from April 28, 1908. Under existing laws (acts of February 12, 1901, and February 28, 1903) the present track connections with the navy-yard must be removed by April 28, 1908. This removal was imposed upon the railroad company as a condition precedent to the payment by the Government of $1,500,000 to secure the removal of grade crossings and the completion of the new terminal station.

The railroad proceeded to remove the track within the time limit specified, but against the protest of the Navy Department, which would thus have been deprived of the means of securing fuel and materials to keep the navy-yard in operation. On behalf of the Department an injunction to prevent the removal of the tracks by the railroad company was obtained from the district court and is still pending.

Two measures to relieve the situation have been considered by the committee. The first, a Senate amendment (S. 3976) to H. R. 13844, which amendment provided for the construction along the north bank of the Anacostia River, between the bridge over the Anacostia River at Pennsylvania avenue and the navy-yard, of a new spur, in consideration of which the Senate bill proposed to pay the railroad company a bonus of $25,000. Since this proposed spur involved the shutting off of numerous streets leading to the river and affected riparian rights, raising also the serious problems of right of way and of Government ownership, the committee, in view of the necessities of the Navy Department and of the three or four thousand employees at the navy-yard, and because of the great delay in the settlement of pending questions and the construction of the proposed new spur, decided to recommend the extension of time for the removal of the present track into the navy-yard for the period of two years as contemplated by this bill. The removal of grade crossings was undoubtedly anticipated by the act of 1903, and such removal is still a desideratum, but as between this horn of the dilemma and the alternative of throwing the employees of the navy-yard out of work until a new spur can be constructed, it is believed to be for the best interests of all concerned that the present track should remain until there is assurance that the navy-yard will be protected against the failure to provide it with suitable trackage facilities.

This is a question which may well be relegated to the District Commissioners, the Navy Department, and the railroad officials concerned.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I can add anything to what is stated in the report. I shall be glad to answer any questions which anybody desires to ask. If there are none, I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Michigan reserve his time?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, in order that this matter may be understood, the act authorizing the construction of a union station and eliminating grade crossings in Washington was passed several years ago and the time for removal of the tracks at grade has expired. I do not remember the exact date, but I think the time for the elimination of these grade crossings expired on February 28. In the meantime the Senate passed a bill providing that the tracks down K street to the navy-yard should remain for two years longer, and authorizing the Pennsylvania Railroad Company to build a siding from where the tracks now reach the Anacostia River down to and connecting with the navy-yard, the act providing that the United States should pay $25,000 of the expense incident to acquiring this right of way. I think the members of the District Committee, or a large number of them, went down and looked over the situation. If we had a map here I could explain it better, but many of you have been out there, and you know that there has been adopted a large scheme for the improvement of the Anacostia River, the deepening of the channel and the improving of the banks, that the channel has been improved up to the Anacostia Bridge, and is authorized to go on up the Anacostia River or the Eastern Branch of the Potomac much farther.

From where the Pennsylvania Railroad now crosses the Anacostia River down to the navy-yard is that part of the river front that would be occupied by the tracks of the Pennsylvania Railroad if the Senate bill should pass, and the railroad company would be paid $25,000 in addition to the right to use Water street. Some, and I believe all of us, thought it was not good legislation to permit this or any other railroad company to build its tracks down that water front, so as to be in the way of the further improvement, so the bill was laid upon the table. But one of the objects and purposes of the Union Station act, which provided for the elimination of grade crossings, to secure which a large appropriation to pay the expenses was made, was that these tracks should be removed and that grade crossings should be eliminated. I introduced a bill which I will ask to have read as a part of my remarks.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. How much did we agree to pay to get rid of the grade crossings?

Mr. SIMS. Three million dollars in cash, as well as other things.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he is hereby, directed to institute in the supreme court of the District of Columbia a proceeding in the name of the United States to acquire a strip of land 33 feet in width for a railroad siding from the main line of the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company to the United States navy-yard, said strip of land to be located along the water front of the Anacostia River from some point, to be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, between the bridge over the Anacostia River at Pennsylvania avenue SE. and 1,000 feet westwardly therefrom, and to follow the bank of said river at such distance north of the north bulkhead line of the Anacostia River, approved June 7, 1904, as may be fixed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, within the limits of the aforesaid bulkhead line and a line 140 feet distant in a normal direction therefrom, as shown on plans on file in the office of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. That said proceeding shall be in accordance with the provisions of sections 484 to 491, inclusive, of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, except as said sections are modified by the provisions of this act; but in case of any question of title arising in said proceedings the money awarded by the jury as compensation for land taken shall be paid into the registry of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, to be there held until title to said money has been legally established.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to construct on said strip of land a single-track siding to said navy-yard, by contract with the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company, or otherwise, in his discretion, at a cost not to exceed $90,000, said work to be begun within two months after title to said strip of land shall have been acquired and to be completed within fifteen months thereafter.

SEC. 4. That the expenditure of a sum sufficient to pay the expenses of such condemnation proceedings and the amounts awarded as damages for and in respect of the land taken for said siding is hereby authorized; and the expenditure of a further sum of not to exceed $90,000 for the construction of said siding and the services of such employees as the Secretary of the Navy shall consider necessary in connection with the construction of said siding is hereby authorized, to be paid from said sum of $90,000.

SEC. 5. That the location of said siding, the grade thereof, and the plans of construction shall be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and the said Commissioners are also authorized and empowered to make, from time to time, all needful regulations for the movement of trains, cars, and locomotives over same.

SEC. 6. That the said Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company is hereby authorized to maintain its present track connection with the United States navy-yard by means of a single track on K street and Canal street SE., either as at present located or as the same may hereafter be relocated, in whole or in part, with the approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, for a period of two years from the date hereof; but at the expiration of said two years, or in the event that the siding authorized in section 3 of this act shall be constructed within said two years, at the expiration of sixty days from the completion of said siding said railroad company shall, at its own expense, remove said present track connection and restore the surface of the streets over which same is laid, to the approval of the said Commissioners.

SEC. 7. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 8. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, if the tracks now there are removed, as required under the law, the navy-yard will be without any railroad facilities. In other words, material can not be shipped in and out by the railroad. Therefore this bill meets one of the necessities of the case; because if we do not continue the trackage as it is now, the Assistant Secretary of the Navy says, as has been stated by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], that work will be, in a measure, stopped at the navy-yard, and great numbers of persons will be thrown out of employment. Therefore both these bills meet that situation, but the bill now presented by the chairman [Mr. SMITH] only provides that the tracks shall remain for two years and does not provide for any construction in the meantime, so that at the end of the two years the navy-yard would find itself in the same condition that it is now. The bill which I introduced and had read is a proposition which I desire to offer as a substitute for the present bill, because it has in it the provisions of the bill under consideration and also authorizes the construction by the Secretary of the Navy of the necessary siding up to the railroad.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Tennessee to say that he considers his motion pending as a substitute?

Mr. SIMS. I want to offer it as a substitute. I am explaining it to the committee with that in view. If the bill which I wish to offer as a substitute is passed instead of the pending bill, the tracks will remain as the pending bill provides, and before the two years have expired a siding will have been constructed by the Secretary of the Navy, either by contract or otherwise, as he may see proper, to be located as stated, subject to the approval of the Commissioners.

Now, to meet both difficulties, one is to keep the track where it is in order to meet the present demand of the navy-yard, and the other to provide construction of a track or siding that will not belong to a private corporation, will not get in the way of the permanent improvement of the Eastern Branch of the Potomac as contemplated, and will not injure or damage the riparian rights of others or get in the way of what may be needed in the way of harbor facilities.

Mr. OLCOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. OLCOTT. I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry. I would like to know, Mr. Speaker, whether the gentleman from Tennessee has offered this as a substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. GAINES of West Virginia]. The gentleman has stated that he did not offer it, but proposed to offer it.

Mr. SIMS. I expect to offer it at the proper time.

Mr. DAWSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DAWSON. I could not hear the reading of the gentleman's proposed substitute. Will he be kind enough to tell the House whether his solution of the question brings the switch in from the east or from the northwest corner, as at present?

Mr. SIMS. From where the Pennsylvania Railroad crosses or intersects the river down to the navy-yard.

Mr. DAWSON. So it would enter the navy-yard on the east side?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; and to remove all existing grade crossings.

Mr. DAWSON. That would not obviate the expenditure of a large sum of money by the Navy Department to reorganize the interior of the yard by reason of the entry of the switch from the east side, whereas now it comes in from the northwest corner.

Mr. SIMS. I do not think that would make any material difference. We went through the navy-yard, and the commandant showed us where it could enter, and from the best we could see and understand it would not require a great deal of change in the existing tracks within the yard. It will eliminate and remove the tracks outside the yard, and which are required by law to be removed, and the removal of which has been prevented by an injunction suit now pending.

Mr. DAWSON. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. SIMS. I will.

Mr. DAWSON. Would it not necessitate the expenditure of $40,000 for the construction of a bridge over the slip now at the navy-yard on the east side?

Mr. SIMS. The commandant did not think so; that is, did not mention it. I do not think so, but I would not put my judgment upon a question of that sort against experts.

Mr. DAWSON. It would be necessary to build a bridge over the slip or abandon the slip.

Mr. SIMS. If the Pennsylvania Railroad Company builds it, it will require just as much. But the point I am making is the siding ought to be owned by the Government, so as to prevent private monopoly securing right to prevent the improvement of the channel. The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad comes down on the opposite side of the river, and if the Government owns it it can authorize any other railroad to build to the navy-yard and give the benefit of competition between the different transportation companies, whereas if only one is authorized to build no other one can come in.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman expect to get unanimous consent to offer this substitute?

Mr. SIMS. I thought I could after explaining the matter and the fact that it would reach both purposes, continue the tracks to the navy-yard and yet provide for new construction within the two years, while the present bill only authorizes and provides for the continuance of the tracks.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman misunderstands the question. I do not propose to object, but I want to know whether I am listening to a live matter or not? Does the gentleman expect to get unanimous consent, which will be required for him to offer this as a substitute?

Mr. SIMS. I know it can not be offered as a substitute except by unanimous consent; but if consent is not given, the bill offered by the chairman ought to be voted down, because the grade crossings ought to be eliminated, and that can not be done without providing some other means of reaching the navy-yard, for it will practically cut them off from facilities by which they must receive their material.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that I very often follow him, and if there be objection by anybody to this substitute—the gentleman perhaps knows whether there will be or not. Does the gentleman think that we ought to vote against this bill if the substitute is not accepted?

Mr. SIMS. I do.

Mr. MANN. If the bill be not passed, what is the effect on the facilities of getting in and out of the navy-yard?

Mr. SIMS. There will be none.

Mr. MANN. I would be myself willing to forever abolish the railroad rights there.

Mr. SIMS. The only trouble is that we ought to provide some means for reaching there that will permit the removal of the tracks as soon as the facilities for getting there are completed. That is the reason I am using the time. It is simply that the House may understand, together with the hope that there may be no objection to the substitute.

Mr. DAWSON. As I understand the gentleman's position, it is that if his proposed substitute is voted down, then this bill also should be voted down.

Mr. SIMS. No, no. If my substitute can not be offered as an amendment, then we should vote the present bill down, and let us report my substitute or some measure that provides for construction during the time that the tracks are authorized to remain.

Mr. DAWSON. But if the bill now before the House were voted down, would it not be physically impossible to secure legislation before the 28th day of this month, after which time connection with the navy-yard would be absolutely at an end.

Mr. SIMS. No; the gentleman does not understand the situation. The 28th of the month provided for in the act was the 28th of February, but the Government obtained an injunction and prevented removing the tracks, and that injunction still remains in force.

Mr. DAWSON. And if the gentleman will allow me, the injunction was based upon this fact, and the injunction can only hold for sixty days. The original act providing for the elimination of these grade crossings give the railroad companies sixty days after the 28th day of February, in which to do the physical work of removing the grade crossings, and the railroad company——

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I used?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has three minutes remaining.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that this bill was not reported by the Committee on Public Lands. If it had been, under the practice now prevailing in the House one amendment would have been in order. Then it would have been possible to vote upon the substitute suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee. This bill is designedly in the interest of railroad companies. They are required under the present law to remove their tracks before they can receive a $1,500,000 contribution toward the grade-crossing expense. This bill does not require them to remove their tracks. It compels them to continue their tracks, and there is no provision that they shall ever remove their tracks. It is designedly, I say, in favor of the railroad companies, although the pretense is that it is in the interests of men employed in the navy-yard.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. I have only three minutes. It illustrates the hypocrisy under which this legislation is brought in and the infamous character of the rules under which we are now operating. It shows that this House as at present controlled is not attempting to legislate in the interests of all the people, but that the managers of the House are continually legislating or permitting legislation to be brought in here for the benefit of special interests, for the benefit of the railroads, for the benefit of the paper trust, for the benefit of every other trust, but not for the benefit of the people whom we on this side represent. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I offer the bill I had read as a substitute for the pending bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan has the floor.

Mr. SIMS. I ask unanimous consent to offer it as a substitute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Tennessee for the purpose of asking unanimous consent?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, then I ask unanimous consent that the bill just read in my time be offered as a substitute for the bill now pending.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to offer as a substitute the bill which was read in his time. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if he could guarantee that we could dispose of it without a roll call and wasting half an hour of valuable public time?

Mr. SIMS. As far as I am concerned, I have no objection to this bill being passed by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, it ought to have some provision in it for universal transfers. [Laughter.] I will not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Indiana object?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. No; I said I did not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman that he offer it to be adopted as a substitute.

Mr. SIMS. That is what I mean.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Seventeen minutes.

The Chair understands that unanimous consent has been given to withdraw the original bill and substitute in its place the bill offered by the gentleman from Tennessee. Is that correct?

Mr. SIMS. And I ask for a vote on it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that that consent has been given. The gentleman from Michigan has seventeen minutes remaining.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa——

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I think I can guarantee there will be no roll call demanded, and I ask that a vote be taken on the substitute.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DAWSON].

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York seems to be under an entire misapprehension as to the purpose of Congress in this proposed legislation. The men most interested in the passage of this bill are the 4,000 workmen employed at the navy-yard. This legislation is wholly in the interest of the Washington Navy-Yard and the employees there, and anyone who thinks the contrary is entirely mistaken in the premises.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAWSON. Not just now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. DAWSON. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is it not a fact that the original act provided that these tracks must be removed before the $1,500,000 is paid to the railroad?

Mr. DAWSON. I think so.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is there anything in this bill that will require the tracks to be removed?

Mr. DAWSON. The original act provided for the removal of these tracks and the original act provided for the payment of this money.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; and this bill compels the road to continue the tracks, and does not require that they shall be removed.

Mr. DAWSON. The original act, as I stated, provided for the elimination of grade crossings and provided for the payment of this money. It also fixed a time limit when the grade crossings should be removed. That limit was February 28, and immediately on the expiration of that time the railroad served notice on the Commissioners that they intended to remove those tracks, which constitute the only railroad connection with the navy-yard, and they undoubtedly would have removed them at that time had not an injunction been secured against them. That injunction, as I was endeavoring to explain to the gentleman from Tennessee, held for sixty days. It held for that period of time which the railroad companies were allowed in the original act to perform the physical work of removing the tracks. That sixty days will be up on the 28th of the present month, which is only a few days hence. If the 28th day of April rolls around without any action on the part of Congress, these tracks will be torn up, the railroad company will get the money which was provided by law three years ago, and the navy-yard will stand without railroad connection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The fact is, the railroad company does not care whether the railroad tracks are removed or not so long as they get the money.

Mr. DAWSON. They get the money whether we provide for an extension or not, and if we do not provide the legislation here we will leave this great industrial plant without any railroad connection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And they will be paid part of the expense of removing these grade crossings that will never be removed—just what the money is paid for.

Mr. SIMS. My substitute provides that the present tracks might remain just like the bill does.

Mr. DAWSON. But here is the point: There is a great necessity for immediate legislation by the Congress upon this subject. We must enact into law within the next five days some measure upon this subject, unless that great plant is to be deprived of railroad connections.

Mr. SIMS. It takes no longer time to pass a substitute than the bill.

Mr. DAWSON. Yes; this House could pass a substitute in the same time that it could pass the bill; but has the gentleman any assurance that such action will not simply block the situation in another body, this other body having already passed a bill which was sent to your committee and tabled? Have you any assurance that your bill, which is a substitute for the Senate bill, will not receive the same treatment at the other end of the Capitol?

Mr. SIMS. Has the gentleman any assurance that this bill, without amendment, would receive any different treatment?

Mr. DAWSON. This does not seek a permanent solution of the matter. It is an emergency measure. This proposes to continue the present facilities until your great committee and a similar committee of the Senate, in their wisdom, can work out——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DAWSON] has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes more to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DAWSON (continuing). Can work out a permanent solution of this question.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DAWSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. If the bill of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] passes and the bill of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] fails to pass, what would be the status? Would the navy-yard be without a railroad track or not?

Mr. DAWSON. It will unless the bill of the gentleman from Tennessee passes the other body of Congress and is signed by the President within the next five days.

Mr. MANN. Suppose it does, can the railroad tracks be constructed in the next five days?

Mr. DAWSON. No, sir. But if his bill should fail to become a law in the next five days, up will come the track.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman's bill provide for the maintenance of the present track?

Mr. DAWSON. Yes; but it provides for the construction of a new track.

Mr. SIMS. To inform the gentleman, I will say that the bill that is now pending without amendment is the exact bill that was sent to the Senate, and they amended it, and provided that the railroad company should build the siding.

Mr. DAWSON. Yes; that may be true, but what I fear, Mr. Speaker, is this, that the bill of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], while it does extend the present facilities the same as the bill of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], at the same time provides for the construction of a new switch, which enters the yard at another point, a switch which would require the expenditure within the navy-yard of many thousands of dollars——

Mr. SIMS. That is exactly the bill the Senate passed.

Mr. DAWSON (continuing). To reverse the switches and all that sort of thing. So the fear that is in my mind is, if we pass this complicated bill, this bill against which there is objection, that the five days will expire and that great industrial plant will be cut off from railroad connection.

Mr. SIMS. There is not the slightest danger of that five days interferring with that injunction.

Mr. MADDEN. Is there any more certainty that the bill presented by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] shall become a law than there is if the bill presented by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] as a substitute shall become a law?

Mr. DAWSON. I think there is, because the bill of the gentleman from Michigan provides for bridging over a temporary and immediate emergency. The bill of the gentleman from Tennessee does that, but it does not stop there. It seeks a permanent solution of what is a somewhat complicated proposition.

Mr. MADDEN. The bills provide for the tracks that are there now to remain, do they not?

Mr. DAWSON. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURLESON. Regular order!

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. MURPHY].

Mr. MURPHY. The bill of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] having gone out, we have nothing now before us but the substitute presented by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS]. As an explanation to the House I will say that this bill does provide for the extension of the time within which the tracks now leading to the navy-yard may be taken up. As stated by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DAWSON], it is correct that without some such provision the time within which those tracks would remain would expire on the 28th day of April. That time really expired nearly sixty days ago, or on the 28th day of February, and the Navy Department secured an injunction in the court restraining the taking up of that track for sixty days, because it is absolutely necessary for the business of the navy-yard that the track remain there until some other outlet is obtained. This bill does contain that provision. It also contains a provision for condemnation.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What bill are you speaking about now? The committee bill?

Mr. MURPHY. The Sims bill. The committee bill has been laid aside. There is no use to speak about that. The Sims bill provides for the condemnation of a strip of land from the tracks of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, near the river east of the navy-yard, down to the navy-yard, and provides for the money for that purpose.

It provides, then, for the construction of the tracks on the piece of ground by the Government, and the contract is to be made for the work with the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, they doing the work. The other track is to remain for two years from this time.

Mr. DAWSON. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. MURPHY. Certainly.

Mr. DAWSON. Have you any idea how much this land would cost which it is proposed to condemn?

Mr. MURPHY. I have not. There is a provision here for $90,000. It will not cost that; a very large portion is already owned by the Government.

Mr. DAWSON. I will say for the information of the House that the matter was considered by the Naval Committee this year, and for the right of way over this square $300,000 was asked.

Mr. BUTLER. Does this include that ground for which the proposition was made for $300,000?

Mr. DAWSON. That is what this bill includes.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, no; $90,000 is the estimate made by the engineers.

Mr. MURPHY. I must decline further interruptions. I am trying to give you an explanation to show you what this bill contains. This matter was presented to us by the engineer department of the railroad company and the Engineer Commissioner, and $90,000, it is claimed, is all it will take, and the railroad companies were to receive for this purpose $25,000 in the Senate bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. OLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, about the first day of the next session of this Congress the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia and the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs will have introduced and asked for the passage of a bill repealing this very substitute, not only because this bill will not be adequate, but because it will cost a great deal more in money. The expenses consequent upon this proposed change in the navy-yard, according to the Assistant Secretary and the commandant of the yard, is going to be perfectly tremendous.

Mr. BURLESON. Why did you not object?

Mr. OLCOTT. I was perfectly willing to hear what the gentleman from Tennessee had to say, and, besides, I do not care to make personal objections. I shall vote for the substitute, of course, and the substitute will be passed now, because it is the only thing before us. We must, as the gentleman from Iowa has said, make some provision with reference to these tracks and provide that they shall remain where they are, or after the 28th of April the Washington Navy-Yard will not have railroad connection. I want to say to you that it will take a great deal more than $90,000 as the cost of the condemnation proceedings. It will be very much more like $250,000 or $300,000, and then the changes in the switches and to the coaling docks will take possibly $100,000 more.

Mr. BUTLER. If the House passes the substitute offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, will the Government be required to purchase land which has been offered to the Navy Department, the cost of which is several hundred thousand dollars and the price of which has been several times raised?

Mr. OLCOTT. In the first place we can not spend more than $90,000. I have no idea that the Secretary of the Navy will expend that or take any steps immediately, so I do not think there is any danger.

Mr. BUTLER. The gentleman will remember that we have talked a good many times about this.

Mr. OLCOTT. I know that we have talked a good many times about this matter in the Naval Committee and the District Committee.

Mr. MURPHY. I will ask the gentleman if we do not pass this bill, will not these railroad tracks have to come up in three or four days?

Mr. OLCOTT. Of course, they will; and not only that, but the Pennsylvania Railroad people, whom the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] says we wish to benefit by this legislation, stand ready to put a gang of men on this work on the 28th of April and tear these tracks up. Of course I shall vote for the substitute, and I hope everybody else will, as that is now the bill before the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What are we voting on?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On suspending the rules and passing the bill (H. R. 20120) which was by unanimous consent substituted for the bill originally embraced in the motion.

Mr. PAYNE. Pending that, I move that the House do now take a recess until 11.30 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pending the motion of the gentleman from New York the Chair will submit certain personal requests.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. PEARRE, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. PETERS indefinitely, on account of sickness.

LEAVE TO WITHDRAW PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, on motion of Mr. ALEXANDER of Missouri, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of H. R. 17830, for increase of pension of Stephen Corwin, Sixtieth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

By unanimous consent, on motion of Mr. COUDREY, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of E. J. Glasgow (H. R. 13714), Sixtieth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

RECESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], that the House take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11.30 o'clock.

The question being taken, the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 119, nays 86, answered "present" 9, not voting 173, as follows:

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXVI, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Acting Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation for rent of building for the depot quartermaster's office (H. R. Doc. 877)—to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, with a letter from the Attorney-General, a list of judgments rendered by the Court of Claims in Indian depredation cases (H. R. Doc. 878)—to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, submitting an estimate of appropriation for rent of temporary quarters and moving expenses for post-office at Asheville, N. C. (H. R. Doc. 879)—to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15448) to amend section 12 of an act entitled "An act to provide for eliminating certain grade crossings on the line of the Baltimore and Potomac Railway Company in the city of Washington, D. C., and requiring said company to depress and elevate its tracks, and to enable it to relocate parts of its railroad therein, and for other purposes," approved February 12, 1901, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 1502), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. NORRIS, from the Committee on Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 20112) providing that all contributions hereafter made to political committees engaged in promoting the election of Representatives or Delegates to the Congress of the United States or of Presidential electors at any election at which such Representatives or Delegates shall be voted for shall be reported by such committees to the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 1505), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. PRINCE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 21091) to authorize the Secretary of War to donate to John Buford Post, Grand Army of the Republic, No. 243, Department of Illinois, Rock Island, Ill., 50 obsolete Springfield rifles, with bayonets, bayonet scabbards, and ammunition belts for same, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1506), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 6648) for the relief of the heirs of Myra Clark Gaines, deceased, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1501), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 5126) to grant to the city of Seattle, in the State of Washington, certain rights of way for sewer and street purposes through and along the military reservation of Fort Lawton, Wash., and through the reservations for the Lake Washington Canal, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 1503), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 4166) to relieve George W. Black and J. R. Wilson from a certain judgment in favor of the United States, and to relieve George W. Black, J. R. Wilson, and W. M. Newell of a certain judgment in favor of the United States, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1504), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of bills of the following titles, which were thereupon referred as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5359) granting a pension to Eli W. Elzey—Committee on Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A bill (H. R. 14143) granting an increase of pension to John Holzer—Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

This bill was omitted from the RECORD of April 22, 1908:

Mr. DIXON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6543) to authorize the expenditure of the unexpended balance of the appropriation for subsistence and civilization of the Northern Cheyennes and Arapahoes for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1907, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 563) thereon.

Mr. BULKELEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them, each with amendments, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 40) to correct the military record of Mirick R. Burgess (Report No. 564); and

A bill (S. 5883) to correct the military record of John A. Oates (Report No. 565).

Mr. BOURNE, from the Committee on Fisheries, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4183) to establish a fish-cultural station on the Tucannon River, in the State of Washington, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 566) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. KEAN introduced a bill (S. 6813) providing for the restoration and retirement of Frederick W. Olcott as a passed assistant surgeon in the Navy, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6814) granting a pension to Frank M. Swan, which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DILLINGHAM introduced a bill (S. 6815) for the relief of Hosmer, Crampton & Hammond, and others, which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DICK introduced the following bills, which were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

A bill (S. 6816) amending section 1443 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, providing for the retirement of officers of the Navy; and

A bill (S. 6817) to reorganize and enlist the members of the United States Naval Academy Band.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 6818) to permit George S. Todd, of Cortez, Colo., to enter, under the coal-land laws of the United States, certain lands in the Mesa Verde National Park, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ANKENY introduced a bill (S. 6819) providing for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at the city of Port Angeles, in the State of Washington, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. PAYNTER introduced a bill (S. 6820) granting an increase of pension to Julia Merrick Tisdale, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. NEWLANDS introduced the following bills, which were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (S. 6821) for the relief of W. J. Goodwin; and

A bill (S. 6822) for the relief of the heirs of George S. Simon.

Mr. McCUMBER introduced the following bills, which were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 6823) granting an increase of pension to Margaret K. Hern;

A bill (S. 6824) granting an increase of pension to John Hancock; and

A bill (S. 6825) granting an increase of pension to Samuel H. Hurst.

BERING LAKE BRIDGE, ALASKA.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 6539) to authorize the Copper River and Northwestern Railway Company to construct a bridge across Bering Lake, in the district of Alaska.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TELLER. Has the bill just come in?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is upon the Calendar, having been reported from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CURTIS. It is a unanimous report from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to look at the bill, and I object to its consideration this morning.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the bill will retain its place on the Calendar.

Mr. TELLER subsequently said: The bill I objected to a few moments ago is not the bill I supposed it was, and so I withdraw my objection.

Mr. HALE rose.

Mr. CURTIS. I hope the Senator from Maine will yield and allow the bill to be passed. It has been read, and the objection is withdrawn.

Mr. HALE. Very well, if it does not give rise to any debate.

Mr. CURTIS. I will withdraw it if there is to be debate.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. CULLOM submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $10,000 for the preparation of the reports and material necessary to enable the Secretary of State to utilize and carry out the work partly performed by the Joint High Commission of 1898 for the settlement of questions relating to Canada, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SCOTT submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $3,000,000 for the purchase, condemnation, or otherwise of the whole of squares Nos. 226, 227, 228, 229, and 230 in the city of Washington, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CARTER submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $3,800 to grade and improve Otis place, from Tenth street to Holmead place, in the District of Columbia, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. PLATT submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to House bill 15372, known as the "omnibus claims bill," which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

WATERWAY FROM BOSTON, MASS., TO WILMINGTON, N. C.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 75) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to make a survey and examination for a continuous waterway from Boston, Mass., by various routes to Wilmington, N. C.

Mr. HALE. What is the regular order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is bills and joint resolutions. The Senator from North Carolina has asked unanimous consent for the consideration of a joint resolution on the Calendar.

Mr. KEAN. I understand that the joint resolution involves a large expenditure of money. I object to its consideration.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will permit me, it does not involve a large expenditure.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. KEAN. Let us have the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded. If there are no further bills and joint resolutions, concurrent or other resolutions are in order.

MESSENGER TO COMMITTEE ON EXPENDITURES IN DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

Mr. KEAN submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That from and after the 30th day of June, 1908, the position of messenger to the Committee on Organization, Conduct, and Expenditures of the Executive Departments, provided for by resolution of January 31, 1902, be, and the same is hereby, abolished, and in lieu thereof the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of State be, and it is hereby, authorized to employ a messenger at an annual salary of $1,440, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate until otherwise provided for by law.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT EVERETT, WASH.

Mr. ANKENY. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 4242) providing for the erection of a public building at the city of Everett, in the State of Washington.

Mr. KEAN. Let us have the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The regular order is demanded.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. M. C. LATTA, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on April 23, 1908, approved and signed the following act:

S. 1424. An act to increase the efficiency of the Medical Department of the United States Army.

FOREST SERVICE EMPLOYEES.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I call up Senate resolution No. 157. It has already been read. I presume there will be no opposition to it, inasmuch as it merely calls for information that it will be necessary for the Senate to have in its possession in considering the agricultural appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. HEYBURN on the 22d instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate a statement containing the name and official designation of any officer or employee of the Forest Service who has attended any meeting or convention during the year 1907; whether such convention was official or unofficial; the place from which such employee started to attend such convention; the place of his employment, and the amount of expense incurred by reason of such attendance upon such meeting or convention which has been paid by the Government.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

LAND AT PEKING, CHINA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of the Congress a communication from the Secretary of State, submitting a draft of a bill providing for the transfer to the Bank of Indo-China of a certain lot of land located at Peking, China, and now the property of the United States, said transfer being in consideration of the transfer to the United States by the Bank of Indo-China of three lots of land located in the said city.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 24, 1908.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 603) granting an increase of pension to John A. M. La Pierre.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 20120) to authorize the construction of a railroad siding to the United States navy-yard, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 20120. An act to authorize the construction of a railroad siding to the United States navy-yard, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the naval appropriation bill be taken up.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 20471) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] desires to submit some remarks to the Senate and has given notice to that effect. I yield for the present to him.

RURAL DELIVERY ROUTES.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I ask to have read the amendment which I offered to the post-office appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the amendment submitted by the Senator from Alabama.

The Secretary read as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. BANKHEAD to the bill (H. R. 18347) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes, viz: At the end of line 14, page 27, insert the following:

"Provided further, That a sum not to exceed $500,000 of this appropriation may be expended by the Postmaster-General, in cooperation with the Secretary of Agriculture, in improving the conditions of the roads over which rural delivery routes are, or may be, hereafter established, to be selected by them for the purpose of ascertaining the possible increase in the territory which could be served by one carrier, and the possible increase of the number of delivery days each year, the amount required for proper maintenance in excess of local expenditure for rural delivery routes, and the relative saving to the Government in the maintenance of rural delivery routes by reason of such improvements: Provided further, That the State or county, or counties, which may be selected for improvement of rural delivery routes therein under this provision shall furnish an equal amount of money for the improvement of the rural route so selected."

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask the Secretary to read the resolution passed by the House of Representatives March 14, 1818, a copy of which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That Congress has power under the Constitution to appropriate money for the construction of post-roads, military and other roads, and of canals, and for the improvement of waterways.
Passed by House of Representatives March 14, 1818.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the question that I am about to discuss is not a new one. The speedy delivery of the mails and the transportation and distribution of production has claimed the attention of our most enlightened and constructive statesmen since the organization of the Government. The transportation and distribution of products is of more importance than production itself. It is the surplus which we sell that makes us richer, adds to the bank accounts, and cancels the mortgage. What the producer consumes at home adds nothing to our wealth. It is that which he sells and transports to the market that makes him rich. If the cost of transportation to the producer is equal to the difference between the cost of production and the selling price there is no profit. Indeed, he is poorer, because his land is being exhausted, his team and his wagon wearing out, the deposits of his mine are being removed, his timber is being consumed, and his manufacturing plant is undergoing wear and tear, all without net results. In all classes of agriculture and in all lines of manufacturing and trade economy of transportation is an important item in the amount of profit. There are three methods for the transportation of commerce—the railroads, waterways, and the common highways or dirt roads. I need not discuss the first method. It has been the subject of extensive discussion, legislation and judicial construction, with which we are all familiar. Transportation by water has been liberally provided for by Congress. The dirt roads, over which 90 per cent of the internal commerce of the country must be moved first or last, have been sadly neglected.

The time has arrived when Congress must meet the great question of national road improvement fairly and squarely and give it that thoughtful and serious consideration which it deserves. The farmers are being aroused, and already the National Grange, with a membership of more than a million farmers, is calling upon us for action in this matter. Another great organization, the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of America, is urging legislation in the same direction. Mr. President, the hordes of southern Europe and the menace of alien races may cast their sinister shadows over our great cities, but, sir, that great, silent, patient element of our population, the American farmer, is American through and through. The very citadel of American liberty and its most cherished traditions are guarded by the farmers, who are 91 per cent native born and constitute more than one-third of our population.

These men have contributed to the wealth of the United States to an extent which staggers the imagination. The corn crop of 1907 alone was worth $1,350,000,000; the hay crop was worth $660,000,000; the cotton crop was worth $675,000,000, and the wheat crop was worth over $500,000,000. Mr. President, it will be observed that either one of these great agricultural crops has produced more actual wealth in one year than the combined output of all the gold and silver mines in the world and $100,000,000 more. The grand total of all crops for 1907 was nearly seven and one-half billion dollars, and it is estimated that the farmers of this country have created during the last nine years $53,000,000,000 worth of wealth. The value of agricultural crops exported in 1906 was $969,457,306, or 56½ per cent of the total exports, and but for the export of agricultural products the balance of trade would have been against the United States by $523,127,533. When the machinations of Wall street, the dangerous practices of high finance, and the injustice of our tariff system bring upon us the woes of financial stringency, industrial depression, and hard times, we must realize that the tillers of the soil form the real basis of our wealth, and that to the creation of real wealth we should lend our aid.

But it is not only the rural population that demands aid from the Government in the upbuilding of our public roads. The numerous resolutions of the boards of trade, chambers of commerce, associations of manufacturers, and the open advocacy of many of our great railroad companies, indicate clearly that it only needs an organization of all these forces to bring about the united and effective efforts of city and country. Modern inventive genius is responsible for a new factor in the problem of transportation which must be reckoned with in legislating for public roads. The automobile industry has now reached to $110,000,000 per annum, and the makers and users of automobiles will soon find a plane upon which they can mutually press forward with the farmer in his efforts to obtain better roads. The time will come, during the lifetime of Senators who do me the honor to listen, when the traction engine and the automobile will be utilized on the improved dirt road in hauling to the market farm and forest products at a minimum cost, supplying the place of millions of horses and mules now employed in transportation.

Mr. President, it is sufficient to call attention to resolutions passed by the legislatures of Maine, Tennessee, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, Alabama, New York, and other States, with reference to national aid, to show how widespread is the sentiment among our State legislatures upon this subject. When all these powers and factors unite their efforts there will be such an era of internal improvement, of home building, of home beautifying, of wealth creation, that the waste places will be filled, squalid huts will give place to beautiful homes, the desert will blossom as the rose, and all the shocks and crashes of frenzied finance will fall harmless from the bulwarks of our splendid prosperity.

The objection is made that such legislation would be unconstitutional. Fortunately, for our guidance, the question of national aid is not a new one. We have the precedent of national-aid legislation by Congress while the founders of our Government lived to know and approve of it. The first appropriation made was in 1806, when $30,000 was set aside for the purpose of commencing work on the famous old Cumberland road. These appropriations then continued, with but little interruption, until May 25, 1838, when the last appropriation of $150,000 was made, which made the total amount expended on road construction during this period about $7,000,000.

On March 14, 1818, the House of Representatives passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That Congress has power under the Constitution to appropriate money for the construction of post-roads, military and other roads, and of canals, and for the improvement of waterways.

Mr. President, what was the attitude of the leading statesmen in the early days of the Republic? Thomas Jefferson said, in a letter to Mr. Lieper, in 1808:

Give us peace till our revenues are liberated from debt, and then, if war be necessary, it can be carried on without a new tax or loan, and during peace we may checker our whole country with canals, roads, etc. This is the object to which all our endeavors should be directed.

James Madison, in a message to Congress, said:

I particularly invite the attention of Congress to the expediency of exercising their existing powers, and, where necessary, of resorting to the prescribed mode of enlarging them, in order to effectuate a comprehensive system of roads and canals, such as will have the effect of drawing more closely together every part of our country, by promoting intercourse and improvements and by increasing the share of every part in the common stock of national prosperity.

Henry Clay advocated the building of national roads in a speech made in Congress in 1818, in which he said:

Of all the modes in which a Government can employ its surplus revenue, none is more permanently beneficial than that of internal improvement. Fixed to the soil, it becomes a durable part of the land itself, diffusing comfort and activity and animation on all sides. The first direct effect is on the agricultural community, into whose pockets comes the difference in the expense of transportation between good and bad ways. Thus if the price of transporting a barrel of flour by the erection of the Cumberland turnpike should be lessened $2, the producer of the article would receive that $2 more now than formerly.

Daniel Webster, speaking in the United States Senate in 1830, used the following language:

Under this view of things I thought it necessary to settle, at least for myself, some definite notions with respect to the powers of the Government in regard to internal affairs, and I arrived at the conclusion that Government had power to accomplish sundry objects or aid in their accomplishment, which are now commonly spoken of as internal improvement.

While it is true that Presidents Madison, Jackson, and Monroe vetoed acts of Congress relating to public roads, it is beyond dispute that the veto of President Monroe was due to a provision giving to the General Government the right of eminent domain and of general superintendence, and this is practically true of the other veto messages. President Jackson held that the right of appropriation was not limited by the specified powers of the Constitution. In his veto message he said:

I have not been able to consider these declarations in any other point of view than as a concession that the rights of the appropriation is not limited by the power to carry into effect the measure for which the money is asked, as was formerly contended.

On May 4, 1802, President Monroe, in a veto message to Congress, used the following language:

That in whatever sense the term established is applied to post-offices it must be applied in the same sense to post-roads.

John C. Calhoun was a staunch advocate of the doctrine of State rights, and believed in a strict construction of the Constitution, but he was equally as pronounced in his belief that the Federal Government should take a hand in building and improving our common highways, rivers, and canals. In 1817 he introduced a bill in Congress to provide a fund for the construction of roads and canals, and, in support of this bill, he spoke in part, as follows:

Let it not be said that internal improvements may be wholly left to the enterprise of the State and of individuals. I know that much may justly be expected to be done by them; but in a country so new and so extensive as ours, there is room enough for all the General and State Governments and individuals to exert their resources. Many of the improvements contemplated are on too great a scale for the resources of States or of individuals, and many of such a nature that the rival jealousy of the State, if left alone, might prevent. They require the resources and general superintendence of the Government to effect and complete them.

But there are higher and more powerful considerations why Congress should take charge of this subject. If we were only to consider the pecuniary advantages of a good system of roads and canals it might indeed admit of some doubt whether they ought not to be left wholly to individual exertion, but when we come to consider how intimately the strength and political prosperity of the Republic are connected with this subject, we find the most urgent reasons why we should apply our resources to them. Good roads and canals, judiciously laid out, are the proper remedy. Let us, then, bind the Republic together with a perfect system of roads and canals.

While Secretary of War in 1819 Mr. Calhoun made a report to the House of Representatives on roads and canals, in which he said:

No object of the kind is more important and there is none to which State or individual capacity is more inadequate. It must be perfected by the General Government or not perfected at all.

It is not necessary for the exercise of a power by the Federal Government that it should be expressly granted in the Federal Constitution, or that it should be "clearly and directly traceable to some one of the specified powers" granted. Any number of the powers granted, or all of them, may be combined and considered together, and any power necessary to carry out the general purposes of any, or all, of the power specified, will be considered granted by implication, and as an incidental means of executing the powers specifically granted. (Pennsylvania v. Wheeling Bridge Company, 18 Howard (U. S.), 421.)

The Constitution, article 1, section 8, clause 1, provides, in part, that—

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imports, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

An appropriation of money for the improvement of the public roads of the country would certainly be for the general welfare of the United States, and it would seem that the Congress is clothed with ample authority, under this clause of the Constitution, to appropriate money for that purpose.

In addition to this, Congress has a stronger and more specific warrant for making this appropriation, under the authority conferred by the Constitution "to establish post-offices and post-roads." Cooley, in his book on Constitutional Law, says:

Every road within a State, including railroads, canals, turnpikes, and navigable streams, existing or created within a State, becomes a post-road, whenever, by the action of the Post-Office Department, provision is made for the transportation of the mails upon or over it.

This provision of the Constitution is growing every year in practical importance and in its relation to the public roads, owing to the extension of the rural delivery service.

On August 1, 1882, President Arthur vetoed a bill making an appropriation for rivers and harbors; but the commercial interests of the country, through organizations of boards of trade, chambers of commerce, and other business associations, had brought such pressure to bear upon Congress that sentiment was developed in favor of reviving appropriations for rivers and harbors, and this bill was promptly passed over the President's veto.

From that time on Executive favor and all constitutional argument seem to have yielded in favor of appropriations for river and harbor improvements; but, by a sort of passive acquiescence, it seems to have gone against public roads and highways; and yet the arguments accompanying each of the veto messages, from President Monroe to President Arthur, admitted that the principle of appropriating money for roads and rivers and harbors was the same, and the same arguments were urged against each. If, then, appropriations for improving our rivers and harbors, involving the same principle as appropriations for improving our roads, is constitutional, why will not an appropriation for roads be constitutional? What valid constitutional objection is there to the one which does not lie against the other?

Post-roads and public highways are highways of commerce, as much so as are railroads or rivers and harbors. They are the small arteries of our commercial body, which extend out into the country and gather up and bring to the market, railroad station, and wharf the great volume of the raw products of the country, which are the real constituent elements of our commerce. They are equally indispensable to our commercial growth and welfare, and are equally deserving of the fostering care of our Government.

It is argued by many that the question of road improvement should be left entirely to the people of the States. It is argued that Federal aid savors too much of paternalism, and, therefore, the General Government should leave it alone; but this objection is irrational and without foundation. It is not proposed to appropriate money out of the National Treasury to aid the people in their private business. It proposes to appropriate public funds for a public purpose, which is not paternalism. Before any State can secure its share, or any portion of its share, of the money appropriated under the Federal aid proposition, it must first show an equivalent amount of self-help and invite the cooperation of the Government. This will be a direct stimulus to the States to put forth their very best efforts. Federal aid, therefore, instead of stifling and causing a relaxation of the efforts of the people of the States, places a premium upon their efforts.

If the Government should undertake to furnish us, without cost or individual effort, the necessaries of life, that would be paternalism. If we were asking the Federal Government to prescribe our daily bread, or to provide us raiment to clothe our bodies, that would be paternalism pure and simple. Such a function of the Government would be enervating; it would destroy individuality and repress all energy and ambition; but we ask no such fatherly care at the hands of our Government. We only ask that it contribute a portion of the cost of improving our public roads, and, in making this contribution, it will so far from committing an unwholesome act of generosity, open up new and improved channels to the marts of trade and commerce, stimulate industrial enterprise, inspire every citizen of the rural districts with a brighter hope and a higher ambition, and add a new tie to bind him with increased loyalty and patriotism to his country.

Congress has been exceedingly generous in its appropriations for Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines. It has spent large sums in these island territories for internal improvements, and much of it has been expended on the construction and improvement of the public roads. These appropriations were made to an alien people who add but a meager contribution to our national revenues, have but little more than humanitarian claim upon our Government, and have shown no thrift, no spirit of progressiveness, and no industrial enterprise or aptitude.

These appropriations, it would seem, have found a sanction under our Constitution and general public policy. If so, then what valid objection can be interposed to appropriating money for a similar purpose to our own people? Our own people deserve the first consideration at our hands. They have demonstrated to the world their superior thrift, energy, industry, and enterprise. It is from them that we derive our national greatness and our national revenues, and they have a right to expect to be first considered and to receive even-handed justice from our Government of its benevolence and the distribution of its revenues.

Another reason for national aid is to be found in the fact that nearly all of the great appropriations made by Congress are for projects that do not benefit the rural districts. The shipping interests have had the rivers and harbors improved, to expedite their business; the cities have been supplied, at a cost of $300,000,000, with post-offices and custom-houses; the railroads have received large appropriations, and have made use of the credit of the Government; millions collected from the people have been loaned to the banks without interest, and iron masters have depended upon the Government to construct great locks and dams for facilitating the assembling of materials at cheap rates for making iron. The tariff laws have been shaped to benefit the manufacturers, but none of them are intended to benefit the great American farmer. Some of our ablest statesmen, and many of those most solicitous of the public welfare, often oppose measures which ultimately prove the greatest boon to the people. On the other hand, it has frequently happened that Congress, in its zeal to extend the blessings of our Government to the greatest number, has given its sanction to projects which savor more or less of futile experimentation. Congress, however, and I might say wisely so, has been slow to stamp its approval upon such legislative projects, but after they have once been inaugurated, and have met with popular favor, and proved a benefit to the people, it has been equally slow to take any step which would cripple their action or retard their development.

Mr. President, let us now consider the rural free delivery system, which is so intimately connected with roads. What has been the history of this service? The friends of this measure were a long time gaining the ear of Congress, and the question was agitated many years before it received legislative approval. It was regarded by many as an impractical theory, an iridescent dream, so, to give it a trial, Congress, in 1897, appropriated the sum of $40,000, only $10,000 of which was used the first year. This appropriation met with such popular favor, and there was such a demend for rural delivery that it was not only renewed, but increased by 25 per cent in 1898. The appropriation of 1898 was increased by 200 per cent for 1899, and an equal rate of increase has continued for each of the eleven years the service has been in operation. During these eleven years they have increased in the aggregate from $40,000, in 1897, to $34,985,000, in 1907. It is stated in the last annual report of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General that on June 30, 1907, there were 37,728 rural delivery routes in operation, the average, or standard, route being 24 miles. The carriers on the 37,728 routes traveled daily over 901,068 miles of the roads of the country, which is nearly half of the total mileage of the public roads of the United States. Every road over which these mails go is a United States post-road, and, under the Constitution, Congress has authority, and in equity and justice should contribute to their improvement and maintenance. While the extension of this service has been marvelous, it has yet encountered no serious obstacle. It has been confined to communities blessed with good roads. Such communities, however, have been very largely supplied, and the future extension of the service must needs be mostly to communities not having good roads. The Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, in his annual report for June 30, 1907, to which I have already referred, has this to say with reference to the bearing of good roads on rural delivery:

> The maintenance of good roads not only insures an early and more expeditious delivery to the patrons residing on that portion of the route last to be served, and from whom most complaints come, but lessens the liability of irregular or suspended service on any part thereof.

It was estimated that the carrier who travels a 24-mile route daily, over bad roads, could, with much more ease, travel from 10 to 15 miles additional over good roads. But suppose we take a more restricted estimate and say that the average carrier could travel 6 miles more if we had good roads. This would increase the average or standard route to 30 miles, and would eliminate every fifth carrier now employed, and would also abolish all the crossroads post-offices, both of which would be a direct saving to the Government. By increasing the average or standard route to 30 miles, and eliminating every fifth carrier, we would reduce the force of carriers by 7,516, which at their salary of $900 per year, would be a direct annual saving of $6,764,400, to say nothing of the abolition of the numerous star routes and local post-offices, thereby saving to the Government many more millions. It is necessary for the continued growth of this service that something be done toward improving our roads. We can not permit it to be checkmated in its growth. No service rendered by the Government is dearer to the hearts of the whole American people than the free-delivery mail service in our cities and in the rural districts. Our people want this service continued and extended. We want to see rural delivery reach its highest degree of efficiency, so as to add to the charms of our country life. We want it so improved and extended that it will reach out into the remotest corners of our country.

The Government sends its mails over 925,248 miles of dirt roads every day in the week. The rural-delivery service would extend over 2,000,000 miles if the roads were improved. As pointed out in the recent report of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, its efficiency and perfection depends upon the system of roads over which the carrier is required to go. No class of men in the Government service performs more arduous duties and are more poorly paid. They are required to drive their team and wagon over miserably poor, muddy, and oftentimes almost impassable roads, through all kinds of inclement weather; they are required to furnish their own team and equipment and to make an average of 24 miles daily, for which they are paid only $900 a year. An investigation made by the Post-Office Department, about eighteen months ago, shows a moderate estimate of the original cost of horses and vehicles to be about $275, and that an average cost of maintaining an outfit was about $250, making the average annual cost of a carrier's outfit from $300 to $350. They carry with them a traveling fourth-class post-office, so to speak; they sell stamps, register letters and packages, receive money orders, and, in a measure, perform all the duties of a postmaster. I believe when we come to increase the salaries of Government employees, these should be among the first to receive our consideration. Why should they not be as well paid as the city carrier, who goes over paved streets, and is not required to supply any team or vehicle. I have introduced an amendment to the pending Post-Office bill, increasing their salary to $1,000 per year, with thirty days' leave of absence, which I think should pass.

Mr. President, the Government has been generous in its donations to railroads in and through many States. There have been patented to the railroads 44,464,719 acres of public lands. Grants to railroads of a much larger number of acres have been forfeited. The Government has in this way aided in the construction of 14,930 miles of railroads, and the bonds of railroads, amounting to $64,623,512, have been guaranteed, both principal and interest.

The Government has from time to time donated for wagon roads 2,014,084 acres of public lands; for canals, 4,500,724 acres, and for river improvement 1,980,593 acres; in all, 53,055,121 acres. The Government has, in cooperation with the States on the lower Mississippi River, appropriated $16,500,000 to aid in the construction of levees and to prevent overflows and the destruction of life and property. No well-informed person would say that the building of levees on the Mississippi River is to improve navigation.

I do not want any Senator to suppose for one moment that I do not heartily approve all these appropriations. They have my full sanction. I believe they were wise and prompted by the most enlightened and constructive statesmanship.

These benefits, to a degree, have been local in their application. What I am insisting upon is a continuation of this wise and beneficial legislation in such a way as to extend its benefits to all the people in every section of our country.

Mr. President, upon the rural population has fallen the entire cost and responsibility of constructing and maintaining our public roads. It is only to a limited extent, and locally, that there has been legislation which, at the present day, in any way shifts this burden, and it still rests upon the people of the rural districts. This is inequitable, undemocratic, and in direct violation of the express principles upon which we boast our Government was founded.

No country has good roads, except where the general government has shared in the cost and responsibility of creating and maintaining them. All the countries of Europe which have improved roads have a national system whereby the national government shares in the cost and assists in the supervision of building and maintaining them.

Our present system of road administration is largely modeled after that abandoned by other progressive nations more than a century ago. In England road administration began, like our present system, with the smallest unit of government, which originated by an act of Parliament in 1555 and provided for the election of a road surveyor for each parish and for the working of the roads by compulsory labor. The parish was found to be too small as an administrative unit. A history of highways, appearing in the Edinburgh Review, January–April, 1864, contains this statement:

> From the days of Elizabeth the inconveniences resulting from the maintenance of highways by single parishes have been constantly apparent, and accordingly successive governments, without distinction of politics, made the attempt to combine parishes into highway districts and to transfer the superintendence of their roads to boards employing the services of professional engineers.

The decided trend of road administration in England has continued away from localization. Subject to the formation of road districts, it was provided that one-half of the expense of maintaining the roads should be borne by the county, and finally, in 1882, Parliament provided that one-half of the expense of the county authorities should be refunded by a Parliamentary grant. This is also true in its essentials of the development of road administration in the other nations of Europe, but with us we have continued in vogue a system of penurious localization.

We can not escape responsibility for our miserable highways by contending that our Government is young and that we have not been a nation long enough to make the comparison with the nations of the Old World possible, because road building did not begin in France until the great Napoleon inaugurated the system of national highways, which is to-day giving France the most superb roads in all the world. England struggled with roads almost impassable until the latter part of the eighteenth century, when the teaching of Macadam, Tresauguet, and Telford began to be effective, and we may say that the present road system of England is attributable to the direct aid granted by Parliament. The advocates of national aid can have no stronger testimony in support of this policy than the following statement made by Commercial Agent Loomis, of St. Etienne, in 1891:

> The roads of France are now practically all built, and they are substantial monuments to Napoleonic foresight and shrewdness. The work of the engineers in the department of public works in France to-day is not to build new roads, except in rare instances, but to keep those already constructed in a state of high efficiency. There have been no important new roads opened in France for a dozen years, and the country is so traversed with excellent roadways that no more lines of communication are likely to be exploited save in the case of military necessity. The wagon roads of France, always passable and reaching all centers of population, no matter how small, are the chief competitors of the railways, as means of communication by water are not numerous.
> The road system of France has been of far greater value to the country as a means of raising the value of lands and of putting the small peasant proprietors in easy communication with their markets than have the railways. It is the opinion of well-informed Frenchmen who have made a practical study of economic problems that the superb roads of France have been one of the most steady and potent contributions to the material development and marvelous financial elasticity of the country. The far-reaching and splendidly maintained road system has distinctly favored the success of the small landed proprietors, and in their prosperity and the ensuing distribution of wealth lies the key to the secret of the wonderful financial vitality and solid prosperity of the French nation.

Our national wealth for 1907 was placed at $116,000,000,000, while that of France was placed at $42,000,000,000; yet we have improved only 150,000 miles of our public roads, while France has improved 340,554 miles.

Is this condition of our public roads an enviable reputation for this great country? After laying claim to superiority over all other nations along almost all other lines of development should we be content to drop to the bottom of the list in road improvement? Can we, at the peril of our commercial interests, afford it? Can we, at the sacrifice of the general well-being and comfort of the great body of our rural population, tolerate it?

Some of the opponents of this proposition would lead us to believe that the macadamizing of all the 2,151,000 miles of roads in the United States would bankrupt the Government. It would be just as absurd to macadamize all the roads in the United States as it would be to build a railroad or dig a canal through every man's farm. It is well known among highway engineers that a horse can, for a short time, exert about four times his average tractive force without injury. By reason of this fact a team of horses can draw for two or three miles as much on a common earth road as they can draw all day on good macadam, gravel, or sand-clay roads.

It should be apparent to any rational being that this two million miles of public road would be classified according to the traffic and the requirements in each section of country, and only the main arteries of travel would require so expensive a form of construction as broken stone macadam. It would be entirely feasible and proper to improve many thousand miles with gravel, many more thousand miles by a mixture of sand and clay, and probably more than one-half of this great total would be adequate if maintained as first-class earth roads. So that it is absurd to figure on the cost of improving our public roads at $5,000 per mile for the entire mileage, or at $4,000, or even at $2,000.

The burden of inadequate transportation facilities falls not alone upon the farmer, but upon the consumer. If it costs 25 cents per ton per mile to haul the products of the farm to the railroad station, the consumer must pay this additional cost without increasing the farmer's profits one penny, and the farmer must pay an increased price for the finished product, which he obtains from the cities, because the same facts hold good, both going and coming. Some years ago corn was burned as fuel in the Mississippi Valley, because it would not bear the cost of transportation, since the margin was insufficient. The railroads lost the freight and the markets the product.

It may be argued that if the advantages to follow road improvement are so great, the States should take action and levy sufficient taxes to improve them. Some of our States have already passed road laws, providing for a road-tax levy on their taxable property. Such laws, however, are necessarily confined to the wealthier States, whose taxable property is suficient to raise the large sum from a small levy. All of our States are not able to levy such a tax. For instance, a tax of 1 mill, levied by the State of Pennsylvania, would raise more money than a tax of 100 mills levied by the State of Nevada. So it is not from a lack of interest in good roads, nor from a want of progressiveness, that all of our States have not passed highway laws, but it is because the taxable property of most States is so small that to raise a sufficient amount of money for practical results would require an exorbitant rate of taxation.

Furthermore, to undertake by State taxation to raise all the money necessary to build and improve our roads will continue the burden upon those upon whom it has so long rested. The State revenues are raised by direct taxation, and the levy is upon visible property. The farmer's property is all visible, and, therefore, never escapes taxation; while a large per cent of the property of the people of the cities is represented by stocks and bonds, is easily removable from place to place, or concealed, and is rarely ever subjected to taxation. The farmers have thus always been forced to bear a disproportionate share of the burden of taxation, which is an injustice which they should be relieved against.

Mr. President, of all the civilized countries on earth, this country has the poorest roads. In all else that is progressive it stands first. In material wealth, in varied resources, in the products of agriculture, in the making of iron and steel, in the number of miles of railroad, in the wealth and opulence of its cities, we stand first, and yet the farmers, who largely contribute to this wealth and greatness, have had less done for them than any other class of our people. Good roads are avenues of progress, the best proof of intelligence; they aid the social and religious advancement of the people; they increase the value of products; they save time, labor, and money; they are the initial sources of commerce, which swell in great streams and flow everywhere, distributing the products of our fields, forests, and factories. The highways are the common property of the country, their benefits are shared by all, and they are needed by all; they benefit all, and all should contribute to them. What fair-minded man will say that the people who live on the public roads should be required to build and keep them in repair for the use of the general public? They could not if they were willing. The burden is more than they could bear. No Government on earth has ever enjoyed good roads where compulsory labor is relied on to build and maintain them.

The effects of good roads reach everybody. Both city and country share in their benefits. In justice and equity, therefore, everybody should contribute to the cost of their construction and maintenance, but an equal distribution of this cost can not be secured under State laws and methods of taxation. Our national revenues are raised largely from duties, paid on consumption, and are thus more equally distributed among the people. Hence, an appropriation of money from the Federal Treasury to build and improve our roads would force every consumer to bear a proportion of the cost. It is not asked that the Government bear the whole cost, but only a part of it; and this is the only method whereby we may hope to secure a national system of improved roads, with an equitable distribution of their cost among those sharing in their benefits and blessings.

What are the savings to be effected by good roads? Investigations, conducted by the United States Office of Public Roads and by various State commissions have established that the average cost of hauling over wagon roads in this country is 25 cents per ton per mile and that the average haul is over 8 miles. The cost of hauling in Europe has, in many cases, been reduced to as low as 7 cents per ton per mile, and it has been established that good roads will reduce the cost to the farmers to as low as 10 cents per mile in this country. This means a reduction by half of the annual cost of transportation to the farmers. It is only necessary to consider the fact that the immense tonnage of farm products is hauled over the common roads to the railroad stations to realize what a tremendous saving is possible when we reduce the cost of transportation even 12½ cents per ton per mile. The importance of this saving is all the more evident when we compare the cost of hauling on wagon roads with the cost of rail and water transportation.

In 1906, the average freight rate by rail was a little over seven one-thousandths of a cent per ton per mile. For the same year, the mean ocean freight rate on wheat, corn, and rye from New York to Liverpool, a distance of 3,100 miles, was a little more than $1 per ton, or three ten-thousandths of a cent per ton per mile. Thus we see that railroad and water transportation rates have been continually reduced, until they have reached a marvelously low figure, while the cost of transportation over our common roads has remained practically unchanged for more than a generation, and will continue so until we can inaugurate some national system of improving our roads.

This duty devolves upon our National Government. It has abundant surplus in the Treasury to accomplish this purpose, and how better could this surplus be used? It has money, and can afford it; while the States and the people have not the money, and can not afford it. Why allow our national revenues to lie idle in the banks, when they might be stimulating our internal improvement, and giving employment to thousands of the unemployed?

Mr. President, the amendment I have offered does not increase the amount of the appropriation made in the post-office bill. It merely proposes to divert from the sum appropriated for the rural delivery service the small amount of $500,000, to be used as provided in the amendment. I do not undertake to lay down any rule, or prescribe any of the details by which the money may be expended. It is proposed to leave that to the co-operation of the post-office and agricultural authorities. They were selected in order to have the benefit of the experiments that have been made by the good-roads division of the Agricultural Department, and the experience and knowledge of the rural-delivery division in the Post-Office Department. The methods and means of putting into operation the rural-delivery service was left to the Postmaster-General, and so were the means of putting into effect and operation the irrigation system left to the Interior Department.

This appropriation seeks to ascertain a practical demonstration of the effect of road improvement in the rural-delivery service in cooperation with the States and counties, and the benefits and advantages to the service by reason of the improvement. I do not believe any effort as to details in the execution of this plan could be prescribed by law.

A number of States, under their constitutions, are not permitted to make appropriations for road construction and maintenance. The State of Alabama is in this situation; but the last legislature, realizing the great importance of public roads, and the inadequacy of present methods to improve and maintain them, submitted an amendment to the constitution, authorizing appropriations for road construction, which will doubtless be adopted by the people at the polls in November. In that event, Alabama will at once be able to contribute its share, in cooperation with the National Government, along the lines of the amendment I have submitted to the pending post-office bill, in the improvement of the roads in every county in that State. The State of Kentucky will vote this year on a similar amendment to their constitution, and perhaps there are other States, where the constitution does not permit the use of public funds for internal improvement.

No government owes more to its people than does ours. No people in the world are more loyal, more patriotic, or more devoted to their government than our people. In time of war they have successfully defended it against every foe, and in time of peace their efforts at industrial advancement and intellectual attainment have reared a commercial empire which excels all competitors, and a civilization which is unsurpassed.

These virtues merit substantial recognition from the Government. Our people should receive governmental assistance in their struggles, as far as the legitimate functions of government will permit. No more urgent and acceptable aid can be extended than a liberal appropriation for improving our roads. This would prove a benefit to our cities and a blessing to our rural districts. Many modern improvements have contributed to the amelioration of the hardships of farm life, but much remains yet to be done. Good roads will add more than any other one thing. Give our farmers good roads, and with the telephone and rural delivery bringing him in easy contact with the outside world, and with his daily intercourse with nature, he will prove the most prosperous and contented and patriotic citizen on the American continent.

Mr. President, I am making a plea for the farmers, not because they are better than any other class of our people, but because they are as good. They do not ask for special favors, but demand a square deal and fair treatment.

The distinguished Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], chairman of the Naval Committee and an active and influential member of the Appropriations Committee, declared a few days ago in this Chamber that 70 per cent of the appropriations made at this session of Congress were in preparation for war or reparation of past wars. A most startling statement when we consider that the United States is at peace with all the world and no strained relations exist between this and any nation on the globe.

I ask the Senate to pause long enough to consider the importance of agriculture and its wealth-producing power, and compare the appropriations made by this Congress, in aid of agriculture, with those made in preparation for, and reparation of, war. The appropriations for war amount to the round sum of $400,000,000, while for agriculture we grudgingly appropriate about $10,000,000. One is designed to kill and maim, make widows and orphans, and fill the land with sorrow and mourning; the other is to feed the hungry and clothe the naked, bring joy and happiness to our people, the building of peaceful homes, and the encouragement of patriotism and love of country.

The toiling millions engaged in agriculture last year produced more than $7,000,000,000 worth of products; they fed and clothed 90,000,000 people at home, and shipped abroad $1,000,000,000 worth of the products of their labor, or 56½ per cent of the total exports of the country. These farmers, for whose benefit and encouragement Congress will this year appropriate only $10,000,000, as against $400,000,000 for purposes I have just mentioned, are not receiving the consideration they deserve.

The internal commerce of the country last year was about $20,000,000,000, nearly all of which must first and last be hauled over the dirt roads at an average cost of 25 cents per ton per mile, or more than thirty times the cost of transportation by rail, the average rail haul being less than 7 mills per ton per mile.

In order to show the immense burden imposed by the dirt roads I have selected five of the leading staple farm products to prove my contention—wheat, corn, cotton, hay, and tobacco.

CORN CROP, 1905–6.

Total tonnage marketed	19,083,000
Average weight of load—pounds	2,696
Total number of loads hauled	14,156,528
Average length of haul—miles	7.4
Average cost of hauling per ton per mile—cents	.19
Total cost of marketing crop by wagon	$26,830,698
Average cost over hard roads per ton per mile—cents	.10
Saving due to hard roads	$12,709,278

The railroads charge for hauling 100 pounds of corn from St. Louis to New Orleans, a distance of 647 miles, 16 cents. To haul 100 pounds of corn over the Missouri dirt roads a distance of 8.8 miles costs the farmer 10 cents.

WHEAT CROP, 1905–6.

Total tonnage marketed	12,123,000
Average weight of load—pounds	3,323
Total number of loads hauled	7,296,418
Average length of haul—miles	9.4
Average cost of hauling per ton per mile—cents	.19
Total cost of marketing crop by wagon	$21,651,678
Average cost over hard roads per ton per mile—cents	.10
Saving due to hard roads	$10,256,058

The railroad charge for 100 pounds of wheat from Chicago to Buffalo, a distance of 525 miles, is 12 cents. To haul 100 pounds of wheat a distance of 5.7 miles over the dirt roads of Illinois costs the farmer 7 cents.

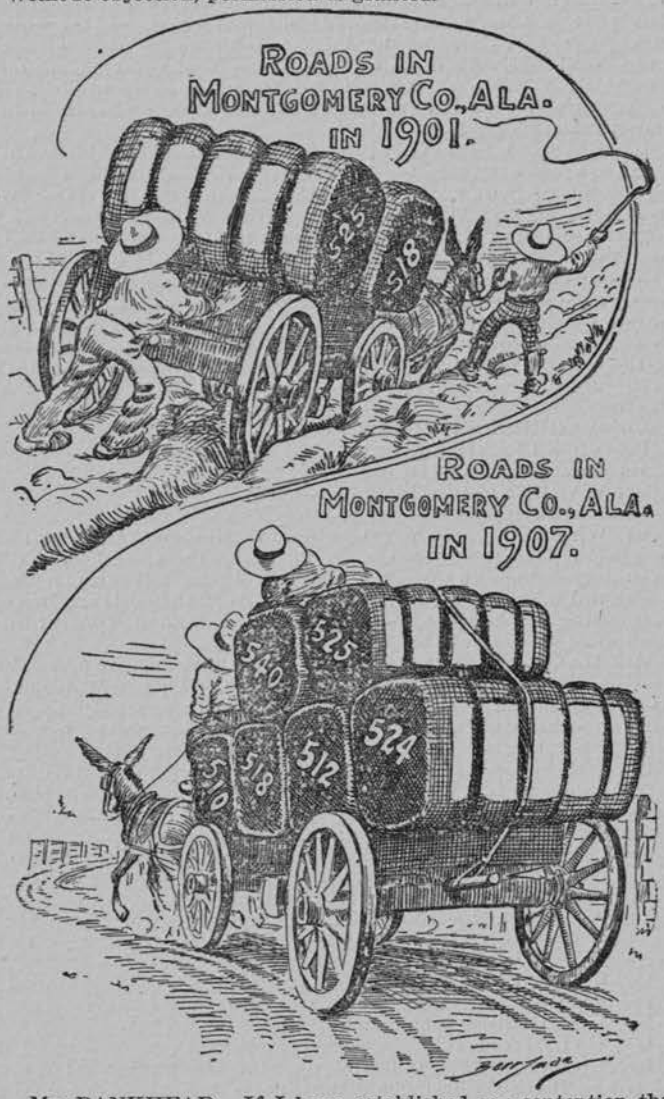
COTTON CROP, 1905–6.

Total tonnage marketed	2,530,000
Average weight of load—pounds	1,702
Total number of loads hauled	2,973,560
Average length of haul—miles	11.8
Average cost of hauling per ton per mile—cents	.27
Total cost of marketing crop by wagon	$8,062,173
Average cost over hard roads per ton per mile—cents	.10
Saving due to hard roads	$5,076,183

To send a bale of cotton by rail from Birmingham, Ala., to Norfolk, Va., a distance of 763 miles, costs $2.55. To haul a bale of cotton a distance of 11 miles, over the dirt roads of Mississippi, costs 95 cents. If the railroad haul cost as much per mile as the dirt road, the cost of sending a bale of cotton from Birmingham to Norfolk would amount to $88.32, or about twice its value at the average price. It costs 18 cents per hundred pounds to haul cotton seed a distance of 13 miles, on a dirt road in Alabama, or one-third of its market value.

The rail haul for tobacco from Durham, N. C., to Richmond, Va., a distance of 161 miles, is 25 cents per hundred pounds. It costs 20 cents to haul a hundred pounds of tobacco over the dirt roads of Virginia for a distance of 11½ miles.

The average farm price of hay, December 1, 1905, was $8.52, and the value of an average load in the United States at that time was $11.87. The cost of hauling the load to market was $2.33, or one-fifth of its value.



The gross earnings of the railroads in 1906 were $2,082,482,406 and the operating expenses were $1,532,163,153. The ratio of operating expenses to earnings was 62½ per cent. Against these earnings was charged for interest, rents, betterments, taxes, and miscellaneous items the sum of $590,386,554 and for dividends $229,406,598, leaving a surplus of $100,000,000. These large sums collected from the public were returned to the people for labor and material, and the money is now in the channels of trade and commerce. It is estimated that the annual cost of hauling over the dirt roads exceeds the total gross income of the railroads. What has become of this enormous sum? It has not gone for material or labor and has paid no dividends. It is merely a tax collected by the roads, none of which can ever be returned to those who paid it. It is a contribution to the miserable roads over which the commerce of the country is carried.

The cotton crop in Alabama last year was 1,200,000 bales, and the cost of delivering it to market was 95 cents per bale, or a total cost of $1,140,000. This was $540,000 more than the cost would have been over hard roads. Bad roads in Alabama, therefore, wrung from the pockets of the farmers in that State in one year on one article alone $540,000, every cent of which was an absolute loss. It is worse than loss, for they paid it in time and wear and tear of their wagons and teams.

Mr. President, I ask permission of the Senate to insert in the RECORD an illustration, showing the benefit of good roads in Montgomery County, Ala.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACON in the chair). Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If I have established my contention that the Constitution does not prohibit, but expressly authorizes, Congress to appropriate money in aid of road construction; if I have shown that there is no invasion of the rights of the States, and that the scarecrow of paternalism does not anywhere show its face, the only questions remaining to be settled are: Is it good governmental policy? It is a good investment, and will it yield a return to the people sufficient to justify the outlay? Will it materially reduce the cost of transporting the vast internal commerce of the country? Will it increase the profit of the producer, and also benefit the consumer? If the expenditure will result in a saving directly to this large number of our citizens, and, indirectly, to all our people, and they are willing for the Government to make the expenditure, why not now begin this long delayed, but beneficial legislation?

It is not the rural population alone that would be benefited; if so, it would be in the interest of a class, and this I could not approve. Those in the city are equally interested, and will enjoy equal benefits and results. The merchant exchanges his goods and wares for farm products, either by barter and purchase or sale. If the farmer can deliver his products at a reduced cost to himself, his profits are larger, he is enabled to buy more goods, and carries home with him more of the luxuries and necessities of life, and adds to the happiness and contentment of the family.

Mr. President, the educational side of the question is sufficient to control my action, if no other interests were involved. A system of efficient public schools can never be maintained until the roads in the rural districts are improved, until the disgraceful cabin, now used as a schoolhouse, gives place to a more imposing structure, located in centers of population, over which waves the flag of our country, inspiring confidence and patriotism. A wide-awake, progressive school in every township, in a comfortable building, and provided with the necessary libraries, apparatus, and equipment, would do more than any other one thing to inspire confidence and respect in the hearts of our young American manhood and womanhood, and it then could be said of America, as was once said of Rome, "All roads lead to the schoolhouse." This Republic must depend for its future greatness upon an intelligent and home-loving people. The religious and social life of our people is largely influenced by the conditions where they reside.

Good roads are the most potential and successful immigrating agents in this country. The most desirable farmers and the best wives and helpmeets are the young men and the young women raised on the farms. Under existing conditions, they are continually drifting to the towns and cities. They are progressive and social in their nature, and will not remain on the farm unless they can have those benefits and pleasures that association and companionship afford. The loneliness of the country home, away from neighbors and friends, where the schools and the churches are poorly maintained, where the farmer and his wife and children are denied the advantages of educational and religious training, are the principal causes for the removal of large numbers of our people from the country to the towns and cities. The farmer is seeking better advantages for his family, and unless the country can be made to supply, in some measure, these benefits, there will continue to be a congestion of population in the cities.

We send a commission to Europe to investigate the question of immigration, and many States maintain immigration bureaus in order to secure desirable farm and industrial labor. The question is often asked by the intelligent and thrifty immigrant, Have you good roads? The most desirable immigrant comes from a country where he is accustomed to good roads, and if he is located where the roads are almost impassable for a great part of the year, he will remain no longer than to make and harvest the first crop.

One of the problems in connection with the transportation system of the country, and one which has in many ways been the subject of discussion, is the congestion of traffic and the inability of the railroads, during certain periods of the year, to move promptly the products of the farm, factory, and mine. Great inconvenience, and oftentimes enormous losses, are sustained both by the producer and the consumer because of the inability of the railroads to deliver freight to its destination at times when it was most needed and commands the best prices. The railroads have not been able to expand and enlarge their carrying facilities in proportion to the increase in production. At certain periods they do not have sufficient locomotives and cars to meet the demands of commerce, while at other periods thousands of cars and locomotives, representing an investment of millions of dollars, stand idle. During the harvest season, and before the rain, snow and freezes come which render the roads in many sections of the country impassable and useless; the farmer is compelled to rush his products to market, which results in an overflow, depreciates prices, and severely taxes the capacity of the railroads.

It has been urged as a probable means of relief the improvement of the waterways of the country, which would, in a large measure, assist the railroads in moving articles ready for transportation, in addition to many other benefits, but it would not avoid the congestion. It would only assist in relieving it. An improved road system, permeating the country districts, would remove the principal cause, would enable the farmer and small producer to place his products on the market at such times when the price is commensurate with their value, or when most convenient to him, and his time could not be better employed. The American farmer is more prosperous to-day than at any time in his history, and in a better position to dictate the price at which he will sell the products of his labor by withholding it from the markets. If the internal commerce of the country could be delivered to the railroad stations at any time during the year, and as the market required, the railroads could properly handle the entire freight of the country. If farm products must be delivered within a limited time, owing to the condition of the roads, the market is congested, the railroads are overtaxed, prices fall, the producer's profit is greatly reduced, and the consumer is greatly inconvenienced.

The result of road improvement, wherever tried, has been largely to increase the value of farm land, for the homeseeker prefers to locate where improved roads provide their many advantages. Indeed, I have been assured that lands have even doubled and quadrupled in value along and adjacent to improved dirt roads.

We hear a great deal being said about the destruction of our timber supply. Mr. President, I do not hesitate to say that, in my opinion, there is sufficient timber, composed of small tracts, belonging to farmers and other landowners, in this country to-day, and which is now considered worthless, because of its distance from the railroad, that could be placed on the market were the roads sufficiently improved, that would supply the timber demand in the United States for seventy-five years, the value of which alone would improve the dirt roads of this country.

Mr. President, in closing, I wish to touch upon a question which I consider of vital importance. It is a question not so much of dollars and cents, not of constitutionality, but one which affects our morality, our character as individuals and as a nation, and the stability of our free institutions. Year after year the human tide flows from the country to the city, and the day may come when the words of the poet may apply to this Republic:

> Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
> Where wealth accumulates, and men decay.

Do not let us have great mobs of the unemployed, combining the scum of Europe with the misled boys from our American farms, so long as there are millions of acres of land waiting to be tilled, and homes waiting to be built. Good roads will make farm life attractive; they will bring the isolated dweller closer to his neighbor, and I feel confident they will check the movement of our rural population to the great cities.

WATERWAY FROM BOSTON TO WILMINGTON, N. C.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I objected this morning to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 75) authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to make a survey and examination for a continuous waterway from Boston, Mass., by various routes to Wilmington, N. C. I withdraw my objection to it. The Senator from North Carolina is very anxious to have it passed. It will take but a moment. The joint resolution has been read.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It authorizes the Secretary of War to cause a survey and examination to be made for a continuous waterway from Boston, Mass., through Cape Cod, thence by Long Island Sound and the approaches to New York City to Raritan Bay, thence across the State of New Jersey to the Delaware River, thence through the States of Delaware and Maryland to the Chesapeake Bay, thence through the State of Virginia, thence through the State of North Carolina to Wilmington, N. C.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. The naval appropriation bill is now before the Senate?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 20471) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I wish to say, before the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES] is taken up, that I have some figures which were prepared at the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] that they should be compiled for the use of the Senate. I will now submit them, before the debate opens upon the battle ships. I intended to put them in last night, but the Senate was very weary and everybody wanted to adjourn. It is a complete list of all the battle ships and great cruisers of our Navy, including the two ships authorized in this bill.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator will not interrupt me until I get through with this statement.

Mr. McCREARY. I desire to ask only one question.

Mr. HALE. Certainly. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. McCREARY. I desire to ask if the statement which the Senator proposes to present is fuller than the one that was presented and inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in response to the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HALE. It is of the same kind, but as to these particular ships, it is a more particular statement. I shall ask that the list be incorporated in the RECORD. It shows a list of battle ships, thirty-one in all, and fifteen great cruisers, many of them as large as the battle ships, with their tonnage and their armament.

I call the attention especially of the Senator who has moved the amendment for the four battle ships to this statement. It shows a navy so large that you may divide it in two, and a larger navy will be left on the Pacific coast than the entire fleet that is now making its way up that coast, and another great fleet very considerably larger, with all of the smaller ships connected with it, more than thirty in all, making an immense home squadron, if I may use that phrase, as applied to the Atlantic fleet rather than the Pacific, although they are both actually home squadrons.

It will leave on the Atlantic coast as our fleet facing toward Europe a much larger fleet than that which is now in Pacific waters, and it will leave in Pacific waters for the protection of the Pacific coast, which I acknowledge we ought to protect, another fleet larger than the entire fleet that is now upon that coast.

I was very glad on getting the complete figures to be able to show, what I do not think is appreciated, the magnitude of the Navy as it is, including the ships that are now being built and those included in this bill. I do not think, perhaps, Senators or the country, or the Senators from the Pacific coast, who naturally desire protection and are entitled to it, have appreciated this fact.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. WARREN. Just for a question.

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I do not know that I understood the Senator very well. Did he say that we could have a fleet on the Pacific coast larger than the one that is now on the way around the world and is on the Pacific, and another in addition larger than that on the Pacific coast for the Atlantic coast, and still a third one left of the same size?

Mr. HALE. No; we would have the two great fleets, a fleet on the Pacific larger than the one that is going around the world, and a fleet left on the Atlantic, which, I suppose, will be perhaps always our largest fleet, as England's channel fleet is her largest, very considerably larger than that.

I call the attention of my friends from the Pacific coast to this consideration. We are not in the position that has been assumed by some advocates of this largest programme. We are not called upon to build another great fleet now in order to have protection either in the Pacific or on this side. I have had some experience and observation; I have reported all the naval bills for years; and yet I did not realize this most significant and to me convincing fact, and this answer to the repeated cry we have now to build up another entire fleet for protection at home.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In estimating the size of the Atlantic fleet does the Senator include the vessels known as monitors?

Mr. HALE. I have not paid any attention to them; they are among the additional ones; but we would have fifteen big battle ships on the Pacific, the same number that are now in the fleet; we would have sixteen big battle ships in the Atlantic; and we would have eight enormous cruisers as large as battle ships in the Pacific, and nine more on the Atlantic; and in addition to all that we would have all of the monitors, all of the protected cruisers, and all of the gunboats, aggregating a tonnage of over 200,000.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to his colleague?

Mr. HALE. I do; with pleasure.

Mr. FRYE. When the Senator speaks of these fleets, does he refer to the fleets after the vessels which have been already ordered are built, and after the two which are contained in this bill are constructed?

Mr. HALE. I do, of course, because whatever question may arise about how many we shall authorize now, we can not get them until after they are built, and we are in a condition about the new big ships, as the designs are already made, that we can go right to work upon them. Any calculation, of course, is based upon ships that we build in the future

In addition to this we can every year have a programme of two more of these immense battle ships, that cost about $11,000,000. That is a matter of administration, as it is everywhere. You may put both of them into the Pacific if needed, or one into the Pacific and one into our fleet here.

I have thought it proper and desirable to present these figures as showing this phase of the case, it being to me a perfect answer to the cry that we are left without protection and have at once to build up an enormous new Navy for our protection at home.

I do not think there is any squadron of any nation aside from her home squadron in her home ports that is as large as the squadron we will then have, or the fleet, whatever you may call it, in the Pacific. So the Senators from that region, who are naturally desirous of protecting their own coasts, need have no apprehension that if the programme sent to us from the House is carried out they will be left in the lurch.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BACON. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator unless he has completed his statement.

Mr. HALE. I am practically through, and I can not go on any longer, anyway.

Mr. BACON. The Senator used the expression "the fleet that is going around the world." Has the Senator definite information of the fact that it is to go around the world?

Mr. HALE. I have on my desk, I think, here or possibly it may be at my house, a communication from the Navy Department—it discloses no secret—in which certain legislation is recommended as being suitable and essential to maintain our rank and dignity in the view that the fleet is to visit Asiatic ports, perhaps African ports, Mediterranean ports, and European ports. So I may say to the Senator, while I do not know it has been formally stated that the fleet is to circuit the globe, I have no doubt in my mind that that is a part of the plan.

I have not known from the beginning what the programme was, because I do not know that any member of the Naval Committee of either House was consulted upon it or any Senator or Member. I do not complain of it; but I can say that at present I have no authoritative information, and I have been in no consultation as to what shall be done with the fleet. But I have no doubt it is going around the world.

Mr. BACON. Does the Senator understand that to apply to the entire fleet now in the Pacific?

Mr. HALE. I have no doubt it comprehends most of the fleet.

Mr. BACON. What does the Senator understand is the object of this globe-circling cruise?

Mr. HALE. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator, apparently listening to me——

Mr. BACON. I always listen to the Senator.

Mr. HALE (continuing). Had heard what I said, it was that I had had no consultation and I had not been in anyway informed—I am very glad I was not—about what is the purpose of this cruise or where the fleet is going or why it is going. I know nothing whatever about it. I have only the information that all Senators have as they see in the newspapers what is going on.

Mr. BACON. With the permission of the Senator, I will ask him, then, another question. The Senator occupies a very responsible position in this body in its relations to the naval branch of the service, and I will say what I am sure will be recognized by every Senator, as well as by the country at large, that no Senator could perform those duties more efficiently and satisfactorily than he does. The Senator in that position must necessarily give careful thought to all matters of importance which relate to the naval service. I am not charged with that duty, and therefore I am not informed, and I look to the Senator for information.

I desire to know of the Senator, occupying that position and considering these matters as carefully as he doubtless does, whether, in his opinion, there is any proper authority for ordering, without the approval of Congress, the fleet around the world and away from the duties to which it is properly assigned.

Mr. HALE. The Senator knows the provisions of the Constitution. The President is the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy. Another clause, not always uppermost in all minds, as the Senator knows, states that Congress shall "provide and maintain a Navy," and another clause declares that Congress shall "make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces."

I should not have seen, I think, all the advantages of the cruise that evidently dwelt in the mind of the Secretary and the President. But I have never taken the ground that sending the fleet around the world was an usurpation. As I said before, I can see some benefits from it in the way of the discipline of the fleet, and the demonstration of the seagoing capacities of the ships and of their being good and complete ships, and it will affect undoubtedly the knowledge and exercise of seamanship on the part of officers and men, and will accomplish some great good in that regard.

But the other questions that arise as to what it will bring about in the way of possible accident and calamity to the fleet, or possible complication with foreign powers, is a thing in the realm not of demonstration but of conjecture. Nobody can tell that. I think the fleet is going around the world, and I shall bid it Godspeed, hoping that we will get out of it without any complication. I will say here the great reason why I do not fear danger is that I do not think any power that is in the track or the observation of the circuit of the fleet under any circumstances will be found hostile to us or that there is the remotest probability or possibility of any war with any nation where the fleet is going. So I am able to possess my soul with some peace about the mission of the fleet and free my thought by day and my dreams by night of any aprehension in that regard. But it is based upon the fact that we are in no danger of war.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask the Senator as to the expense. How is the expense borne? From what fund is it taken?

Mr. HALE. It is borne largely in deficiency bills, and there will be additional deficiency bills another year undoubtedly. In fact, I think we were called upon to pass a heavy deficiency bill covering the fleet and its visitation in the early part of the session. I was informed the other day by the head of a bureau in the Navy Department that before Congress adjourned he would come in and ask for additional deficiencies; that we had not given them enough. Next year when they come in we will appropriate for the final deficiency. There is no fund.

As Senators know, the fleet's dispatch, its starting, was not in any way left until Congress had assembled and the expression of Congress required as to appropriations for it. It had all been settled and the fleet was off and out of the way substantially, if not actually started, when Congress met, so that Congress had no opportunity to make a special appropriation until the deficiency bill came up, when we made a large appropriation.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator if he can make any estimate as to what the additional cost of this trip will be to the American people?

Mr. HALE. I can make no more estimate about it than I could make an estimate as to what shall be the course of the circuit of a bird in the sky. I do not know.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HALE. I yield.

Mr. BACON. Recurring to the reply of the Senator from Maine to my inquiry as to the authority for sending the fleet around the world, I will say that I had in view both the provisions of the Constitution which he has cited, one of which makes the President of the United States the Commander in Chief of the Navy, the other of which retains in Congress the authority for making rules for the government and regulation of the Navy. I simply desire to say, without consuming unnecessary time, as it is a matter which ought to have some expression from some one, that in my opinion any use of the Navy outside of that which pertains to its ordinary uses, those for which the Navy is designed and the use for which it is anticipated, should have the sanction of Congress before it is done.

So far as the sending of the fleet to the Pacific coast is concerned, I can understand how that may be within the legitimate sphere of the use of the Navy. I have no criticism to make upon that, although, of course, we are none of us informed as to all of the reasons which may have existed and some of which I have no doubt did exist and still exist which would justify the sending of the fleet to the Pacific coast. What I have to say has no relation to that whatever. But when it comes to sending the fleet around the world, that is another matter. Whenever an enterprise of that magnitude is undertaken, so absolutely foreign to the uses which are contemplated in the construction of a navy and in the government and regulation of a navy, I say not simply the Executive, but the great law-making power of the Government ought to be that which should give its sanction and which should authorize it.

I understand the Senator to say that he is reconciled by the fact that he has no apprehension that the fleet is going to meet with any hostile demonstration upon its way; and of course we all of us are thoroughly confident of that. We have no apprehension of any war meeting them upon their course. But at the same time, while we have no apprehension of war, I think that so far as this globe-circling expedition is concerned, it removes the fleet farther away from the United States than anyone would have the authority to send it except the law-making power of the Government.

There are other reasons which could be mentioned. I will not take the time of the Senate, but I do say that there ought to be in some department of Congress an expression of the view that Congress does not lose control of the fleet by reason of the fact that the President of the United States is Commander in Chief of it. He is the Commander in Chief, and Congress could not deprive him of that position if it desired to do so; but the fact that he is Commander in Chief does not relieve Congress from the control of the operations of the fleet whenever a great and an unusual use is to be made of it. Whenever a use is to be made of it, in the language which was used on the floor two days ago, for any spectacular purpose, clear outside of the part of the world where the fleet properly belongs, then it should only be undertaken, in my opinion, when Congress has approved it.

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. RAYNER. I only desire to ask the Senator from Georgia a question, if the Senator from Maine will permit me.

Mr. HALE. Let me say, Mr. President, I rose entirely for the purpose of calling the attention of the Senate to the actual strength of our fleet—the capability of its subdivision—and I wanted to put in the statement before the Senator from Washington should go on with his remarks upon his amendment, in order that it might not be said that it was put in afterwards, but that he might see, and all the Senate might see, what navy we have and how, when subdivided, it protects his coast as well as my coast.

I, myself, do not want to debate it any more. I do not want to interfere with the debate on the battle ships, and I am in no condition physically, with trouble and menace in my throat, to continue longer on the floor. Still, I will listen to the Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine yields to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. RAYNER. I only desire to ask the Senator from Georgia a question. I have given some little consideration to the question involved here, legal and constitutional, and I should like to ask the question whether, in the absence of a law or a regulation by Congress, the President, as Commander in Chief, has unlimited power; in other words, whether it does not take a law or regulation of Congress to limit the powers of the President under the Constitution.

Mr. BACON. Undoubtedly; nobody would for a moment question that fact, and nobody will question the propriety of the President sending a vessel to any country in the world where he thought the interests of the Government, or the interests of any citizen, required the presence of a man-of-war. But that is a very different thing from the question as to the propriety of sending the fleet around the world for spectacular purposes. The question of the existence of authority to exercise a power is one thing, but the question of the proper and legitimate use of that authority is altogether another question.

Mr. RAYNER. I thought the Senator was discussing the legality of it.

Mr. BACON. Of course, nobody denies the fact that the President has, in the absence of any expression from Congress, the authority to do it. I am simply considering the question whether or not it is a proper use of that authority. In my judgment, it is not a proper use of the authority. If there was a suggestion of that kind in the Executive mind, it seems to me that Congress ought to have been appealed to for its approval before it was undertaken.

Mr. HALE. I ask pardon of the Senator from Washington, who I know desires to go on with his amendment, for having taken up so much time. It is not all to be laid at my door. I simply ask that the statement I have submitted be incorporated as a part of my remarks in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

UNITED STATES.

Battle ships (31) built, building, and in pending bill.

1906	St. Louis[a]	9,700		22.13
	Grand total	186,545

[a] Officially the three ships are protected cruisers. They are actually armored cruisers, and so treated by standard foreign publications. If included in above table, they would give: Grand total, fifteen armored cruisers; 186,545 tons.

* Marked obsolescent by foreign publications.

Mr. CULBERSON. Before the Senator from Maine yields the floor, reverting to the suggestion made by the Senator from Georgia to the Senator from Maryland, I read the provision of the Constitution to the effect that Congress is authorized "to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces."

The question I desire to put to the Senator from Maine is this: Under existing law and the rules and regulations for the government of the Navy, which Congress is authorized by this provision of the Constitution to make, is the President, in sending the fleet around the world, if he purposes doing so, acting within the limit of those regulations or is he exceeding them?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have referred in my remarks to the provision of the Constitution, with which we are all familiar. I am inclined to believe, in the absence of any rules or regulations touching this question by Congress, under the provision just cited by the Senator from Texas, that the President would have the power and authority to order the fleet, but that should Congress at any time interfere and establish rules and regulations conflicting with it, the President must yield to Congress. But Congress, so far as I know, has made no rules or regulations touching this subject, so that whatever may be my view about the expediency of the voyage of the fleet, I do not think there has been any case of Presidential usurpation.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, I should like to ask him this question: If, in the appropriation which was made for the present fiscal year, there was in contemplation any appropriation for the fleet being sent around the world?

Mr. HALE. Not the least, Mr. President. When the appropriations were made up last spring and when an opportunity was presented before the committee of bringing this question up and asking for appropriations——

Mr. BACON. None was asked for.

Mr. HALE. No committee was asked to give such an appropriation.

Mr. BACON. Now, I will ask the Senator one other question: After this voyage has been undertaken, and when it is known that there must be this increased expense, has there been any effort to get an appropriation from the committee, or has there been any estimate submitted?

Mr. HALE. In advance?

Mr. BACON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. The only effort that has been made, which has been responded to by Congress, was the estimate for a deficiency.

Mr. BACON. Did the deficiency specify a contemplated trip around the world?

Mr. HALE. It was mainly for coal, which was for the fleet.

Mr. CLAY. It was for coal and repairs, was it not, I will ask the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HALE. I do not remember.

Mr. CLAY. My recollection is that the sum appropriated was about four and a half million dollars, and the Navy Department gave the Committee on Appropriations estimates of how much had been spent for that purpose. My recollection is that while a large part of it was spent for coal, some of it went for repairing the ships that were on the way to the Pacific coast.

Mr. HALE. If so, it was for small incidental repairs. The main thing was coal.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy under the Constitution, has, of course, always in time of war and in time of peace directed the movements of the vessels and of fleets; that is, we have sent squadrons at all times to different parts of the world. We usually maintain squadrons in different parts of the world, and it is unquestionably within the power of the Commander in Chief to move one ship or to move a dozen, or to take any step which, as Commander in Chief, he may think is for the advantage of the service and is necessary to be performed by that service. I think there can be no question, as the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has said, that there is no matter of usurpation here whatever. This instance has been more conspicuous simply because the fleet is larger. It was done with a specific purpose, which, as I explained the other day, seems to me is an extremely wise purpose.

I can not conceive any greater misfortune for the welfare of the Navy of the United States than to undertake to have committees of Congress pointing out what voyages the ships should take and where they should go. In the first place, Congress is not in session all the time, and if it were I can not conceive of a body more unfit for the exercise of executive functions than a great legislative body.

The Commander in Chief must be intrusted with the direction of the land and naval forces. Just as President McKinley in time of war massed the American fleet and proposed to send it and would have sent it to the coast of Spain, so this power has been exercised year in and year out by every President in time of peace. I do not care to again go over the question whether this voyage was a desirable one or not, but it seems to me that it has been of great advantage.

The idea that we can keep ships without wear and tear! Battle ships are made to be used; and if they are used, like all ships in the merchant marine, they are going to show the wear and tear and a certain amount of depreciation, and they will at times require repairs. We do not expect to build a great fleet of ships and keep them all the time tied up to the docks in New York or Boston or Norfolk. They would be perfectly worthless if they were not sent to sea, so that the crews may be exercised in the management of the ships. No better way for the development of the American fleet could have been devised than this great voyage which is being made.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES] has substantially had the floor for more than an hour, and I hope he may now be allowed to proceed.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to make any extended remarks in behalf of four battle ships. I think that a mere statement of the facts will show the wisdom of Congress providing at the present time for the construction at as early a date as practicable of four additional battle ships.

I have not been unmindful of the character and condition of our fleet as pointed out by the list which the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has sent to the Secretary's desk and asked to have printed in the RECORD, nor the fact that eleven out of the thirty-one battle ships which are referred to in that list are of practically an obsolete type and of less than 13,000 tons displacement, and that about six of those ships need extensive repairs before they will be brought to the standard of ships of their class. This, I think, makes it apparent to all that the time is opportune to provide the people of this country a greater defense than they now possess.

Mr. President, the President of the United States, in the special message which he sent to Congress on the 14th instant, among other things said:

> As Chief Executive of the nation and as Commander in Chief of the Navy, there is imposed upon me the solemn responsibility of advising the Congress of the measures vitally necessary to secure the peace and welfare of the Republic in the event of international complications which are even remotely possible. Having in view this solemn responsibility I earnestly advise that the Congress now provide four battle ships of the most advanced type. I can not too emphatically say that this is a measure of peace and not of war. I can conceive of no circumstances under which this Republic would enter into an aggressive war; most certainly, under no circumstances would it enter into an aggressive war to extend its territory or in any other manner seek material aggrandizement. I advocate that the United States build a navy commensurate with its powers and its needs, because I feel that such a navy will be the surest guaranty and safeguard of peace.

In view of this urgent appeal to Congress, and in view of the further fact that I come from a section of the country which will be the storm center of the conflict, if we have war, I have felt it my duty to submit for the consideration of the Senate the pending amendment.

Mr. President, I know that the people of the Pacific coast are in favor of this present Congress providing for four additional battle ships. I know that those people, with the sturdy manhood with which they are imbued, with the wonderful progress which they have made, and with the great commerce which they have builded for this Republic upon the Pacific Ocean, are entitled to have a navy adequate for their peace and security.

I am satisfied, Mr. President, not only that the people of the Pacific coast favor this proposition, but that the people of this country, from whatever section they may hail, favor it, and as an evidence of popular opinion with respect to this question I send to the Secretary's desk an article appearing in the New York Telegram on the 23d instant, showing the attitude of the men who, to a very large extent, mold public opinion in this country—men who have their fingers upon the public pulse and who are thoroughly in touch with our national needs. I ask, Mr. President, that the article I have submitted be read for the information of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From New York Telegram, April 23, 1908.]

BIG-NAVY POLICY POPULAR.

Of the 162 editors and publishers who filled out the Evening Telegram battle-ship ballots, 126 were in favor of President Roosevelt's policy of building four battle ships at this time and believed that the nation should have a larger navy. These included Johnson and Bryan men, as well as those who had expressed themselves in favor of the nomination of either Roosevelt, Taft, Hughes, or the Republican dark horses.

Herman Ridder, editor of the New York Staats-Zeitung, and Edward L. Preetorius, editor of the Westliche Post, of St. Louis, Mo., generally regarded as the most representative German newspaper man of the West, both voted for the big-navy programme.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. PILES. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will ask the Senator from Washington if the editors there referred to were not the editors of newspapers in the Associated Press system of this country, comprising most, perhaps, of the large journals?

Mr. PILES. Those are the men, as I understand it, sir, that constitute the membership of the Associated Press throughout the country. Those men, Mr. President, come fresh from the people, and they voice their sentiments on this most important subject.

Comment has been made in the Senate from time to time with respect to the cruise of the battle ships to the Pacific coast. In my judgment, no wiser cruise could have been made or planned for the benefit of the American Navy than the one upon which our fleet is now engaged. In addition to the benefits that will result to the Navy from such a cruise, the people of the Pacific coast who have not had the pleasure of visiting the Atlantic coast will now for the first time have an opportunity to view their country's fleet, toward which they have contributed according to their population and wealth as much as any other section of the nation. The advent of the fleet upon the Pacific coast will give the people there a realization of our actual naval strength, and those who officer and man the ships will come to an understanding of the importance of that section of the country and the inadequacy of the defenses provided for it.

I am not one of those, Mr. President, who have been fearful of war with Japan or any other country. We are a peace-loving, law-abiding people, without the desire to conquer any nation or to despoil it of its territory. We seek not to aggrandize ourselves by a resort to arms, but rather to add to the stability of our nation and to the happiness of our people by avoiding all unnecessary conflicts. Having achieved our liberty and our independence by a resort to arms, and having for a time divided our country and estranged our people in the most unhappy war that the world ever witnessed, we are content at last to rest in the security of our own homes and in the enjoyment of the fruits of our labors while those war who seek war. And while, Mr. President, we should avoid war in so far as may be consistent with our national honor, it is idle to say that we should not have a navy sufficient to secure our peace. No nation, however great or powerful it may be, can hope to maintain its peace with the world unless it is prepared to defend itself.

We have reached that period in our history when it is prudent, if not absolutely necessary, to have two fleets, one on the Atlantic coast and another on the Pacific coast, to insure our peace.

Our population and commerce have increased in an incredibly short time beyond all reasonable expectation. The increase of our population and the expansion of our commerce have made the Pacific coast an attractive field for the races of Asia. The migration of the Asiatics to our country has led to differences in the past of serious international consequence, and no one can say with any degree of certainty that similar differences will not occur in the future.

Japan, Mr. President, has made wonderful progress in the last twenty-five years; indeed, her progress is one of the marvels of the age. No one rejoices more sincerely in her remarkable advancement in civilization and in commerce and in all that goes to make her a great and powerful nation than the American people. But, rejoicing as we do in her onward and upward march, there is, unhappily, a question between us the settlement of which may some day sever the cord which binds us in international friendship. While I feel safe in saying that the people of the Pacific coast have no ill feeling against the Japanese as a people, there is a deep-seated conviction in the minds of our people, which time can not eradicate, that it is hurtful to our peace and happiness to permit Japanese laborers to invade the Pacific Coast States and displace our own working people. The Japanese laborer has been reared in a school of domestic economy totally different from that of the American laborer. This, Mr. President, I do not refer to as a reflection upon the laboring classes of the Japanese, but merely as illustrative of a condition which makes it impossible for the American laborer to compete with the Japanese laborer. And where competition is shown to be impossible, it goes without saying that the two classes can not dwell together in unity. Self-defense is innate in the American and in every other nationality.

When, therefore, the American sees the Japanese swarming his country, living on much less and working for much less than he can live on or work for, it is but natural that he should rebel and call upon his Government to take measures to exclude those from his country with whom he is unable to successfully compete in the struggle of life. If those against whom he complains are not to be excluded, or are not excluded as promptly as it is thought they should be, men sometimes resort to violence, which is always unfortunate and deplorable. There have been violent uprisings, not only in American territory, but in the British possessions bordering on the North Pacific Ocean. The statesmen of Japan, Mr. President, are, of course, fully conversant with the situation and would no doubt, if they could, prevent their laboring classes from going to either the American or British territory on the Pacific coast. But when it is understood that a Japanese laborer can ordinarily earn more on the Pacific coast in a day than he can earn in his own country in a week and a half, the difficulty of restraining him becomes painfully apparent.

There is every reason, Mr. President, why the American and Japanese nations should be fast friends. From the earliest time America has been the friend of Japan. They are the two dominant powers in the Pacific Ocean, each striving to build a great commerce which will be beneficial to both, and it would be most unfortunate if the conditions to which I have briefly adverted, or an attempt on the part of Japan to close the open door in China or Manchuria, should bring about a conflict between the two friendly powers.

While both nations, Mr. President, are desirous of peace, no one can say what may occur in the future to precipitate war between America and Japan or any other country.

The time has come, I say, in the history of our country when this Government, not for war, which it abhors and which all patriotic Americans abhor, but for the security of our peace, should make provision for two fleets, one for the Pacific coast and one for the Atlantic coast, and, if we had two such fleets in this country, we would wage war against no nation and no nation on earth would wage war against us. So, in advocating four battle ships, I stand for peace and not for war.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. PILES. Certainly; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator does not desire to be interrupted, I will not interrupt him.

Mr. PILES. I am very glad to yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. The thought occurred to me when the Senator was picturing so well the danger of an outbreak which may occur at any time, if at all, how would it be possible for him to get into that fight either of these two additional ships that he wants now constructed?

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, I do not expect to get the additional ships into any fight. I expect this Government to take the precaution that an ordinarily prudent individual, threatened with a possible danger, would take for self-defense. That is all I ask, or have a right to expect.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. PILES. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. Is there any peculiar virtue about four rather than any other number of battle ships? Would four affect the peace of the world more than five or six or a less number?

Mr. PILES. I am not arguing upon that theory, Mr. President. If I were, I should find myself arguing in a circle. The President of the United States has recommended to Congress four battle ships. I understand that the Department of the Navy and the Secretary of State concur in the President's views on this subject; and I take it that these gentlemen, who are informed, or should keep themselves informed, with respect to questions of this character, ought to know more about it than at least the majority of us who can not, in the nature of things, be so well advised in that regard as they.

Mr. HALE. Does not the Senator remember that the Secretary of State, to whom he has referred, has told us more than once that not only now there is no danger of complication or friction with Japan, but there has been no time when there has been any such condition?

Mr. PILES. I am very glad of that, Mr. President. As I said at the outset, I have no fear of war with Japan. I have no fear of this nation engaging in war with any of the great powers of the world. I am not standing here asking for four battle ships upon the theory that this country is going to engage in war; but I am advocating provision for four ships because it is necessary in the opinion of the Chief Executive of this country and those upon whom he relies for advice to plan now for four—not six nor two—battle ships.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. PILES. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator is talking about the possibility of war. I see no reason why this question, if it should be discussed in the Senate at all, should not be discussed frankly and openly. There can be no power with which war can be had upon the Pacific Ocean, which the Senator from Washington said must be the storm center of war, except with Japan? Does the Senator expect that Great Britain will join with Japan in this anticipated war of his, and does he want the United States to build a navy that will cope successfully with Great Britain's navy?

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island is mistaken when he says I spoke of my anticipated war. I have anticipated no war. I anticipate none.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understood the Senator from Washington to say in his opening statement that the Pacific Ocean would be the storm center of whatever conflict took place in the future.

Mr. PILES. I said, if I remember correctly, Mr. President, that the Pacific Ocean would be the storm center of war if we had a conflict with Japan. That was my statement, as I now recall it; and I am not afraid of war. I predict no war. I hope we will never have war. But, Mr. President, no man in this country foresaw the Spanish-American war. No man could have been brought to believe six months before we engaged in that conflict that we would ever have a war with Spain. No man foresaw the trouble which occurred between the Americans and the Japanese in San Francisco a little more than a year ago, which strained the relations between this country and Japan. No man foresaw the raid that was made upon the Japanese in the city of Vancouver, British Columbia; and no man can foresee or foretell what another raid may mean.

There are certain classes of people in this country who would like to get us into war. There are certain classes in the Japanese Empire who would like to see Japan wage war. But there is every reason why the international friendship existing between this country and Japan should continue to the end. America has been her friend. No country in the world rejoices more in the great commercial progress and strides in civilization which she has made. But, Mr. President, rejoicing in that progress and in that civilization, we can not help the condition that exists. We can not foretell when a raid may be made upon the Japanese in any section of the Pacific coast. We can not tell when Japan may be forced by her people to take offense at the treatment of her subjects at the hands of some irresponsible individual or individuals on the Pacific coast.

Mr. President, that is one of the conditions which this country should take into consideration in determining this question. It is not wise policy to wait until war is upon us, and to spend hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars in defending ourselves against a foe.

Who can tell what will be the policy of Japan with respect to closing the open door in China and Manchuria? The greatest interest of the United States is to-day in the Pacific Ocean. Civilization demands that China be not disintegrated; that zones of trade or influence be not parceled out among the powers of the earth. These are problems with which we will sooner or later have to deal. One nation is going to dominate the Pacific, and if we do not some other nation will.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. PILES. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Washington has referred to the Spanish-American war and our unpreparedness, and I simply wish to remind him that the preparations we were obliged to make in the beginning of the Spanish-American war ran our expenditures up to about $130,000,000, nearly three times the expenditures of the two years before. I desire to view it fairly, but I can not see now where we invested that money; where our Navy has been permanently strengthened at all by reason of that sudden expenditure. It seems to me we ought to go along with a fixed and definite policy that will really strengthen our Navy, and not be called upon as an emergency arises to expend our money for useless implements of war, which we must abandon as soon as the war is over and which do not constitute a working part of our offensive and our defensive arms.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, it has been said that if we provide for four battle ships we will offend other nations, and the world will say we are preparing for war while simulating peace. I see no force in this contention in view of what the maritime nations of the world are doing with respect to enlarging and improving their navies.

We started upon a new era of battle-ship building after the Spanish-American war, and why should the world find fault with our pursuing a well-defined and well-understood policy.

Again, if other nations are constructing a greater number and a larger and better class of battle ships than they heretofore thought necessary, why should we fail to keep pace with the other great powers so long as we act within the bounds of reason? Of what consequence are two or three or half a dozen old and obsolete battle ships as compared with one of the Dreadnought class?

Why should the world say we are preparing for war when we undertake to increase our Navy within reasonable limits or to construct the same class of battle ships that the great powers of the earth deem it advisable to construct for their peace? Why should my neighbor complain if I work upon the same precautionary lines for my peace and happiness that he works upon for his peace and happiness?

We take no offense because Japan is enlarging and improving her navy, and why should Japan take offense if we do what she is doing; what England, France, and Germany are doing?

Mr. President, it is said that it is the policy of Great Britain to maintain her navy equal to that of any two nations in the world. Does anyone take offense because of this policy or menace her by reason thereof? Does Great Britain encroach upon or seek war with any other power with that navy? No; she stands there in the sea with her people relying upon her great navy, not to wage war against the weak or the strong, but to preserve her peace. And, Mr. President, a navy sufficient for the preservation of our peace is all that I contend for.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. PILES. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator from Washington has referred to the naval strength of Great Britain to the effect that nobody has menaced or threatened Great Britain. I simply want to add this suggestion to that thought: No one has menaced Great Britain, and yet the strength of the British navy has attracted Japan, and Japan and Great Britain have entered into a treaty, both offensive and defensive, to insure the territorial integrity of their possessions in the Far East. So while the British navy has menaced no one, it has attracted that powerful country in the Pacific to its side, and to-day those two countries are in treaty of alliance for the maintenance of their prestige and the welfare of their possessions in the Far East.

Mr. PILES. The Senator from Michigan is correct, and it is not at all astonishing that Japan should have been attracted to Great Britain by her splendid navy, and that she should have sought a defensive and offensive alliance with that great Empire. But with the Navy we have to-day, with, as I have said, eleven out of the thirty-one battle ships of an obsolete type——

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. PILES. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Does not the Senator know that instead of the ships to which he refers being obsolete, the Navy Department tells us in its communication that they are among the best ships we have? We are appropriating this year for repairs upon these same ships ranging from five hundred to six hundred and seven hundred thousand, in order by those repairs that they may not be obsolete ships, but complete ships. There is not an obsolete ship of the battle-ship type in the American Navy to-day.

Mr. PILES. They are of an obsolete type, I understand. Take, for instance, the Oregon. The world never saw a greater fighting ship than the Oregon in her day. But what is her condition now? Would the Senator from Maine contend for a single moment that the Oregon could give battle to any power?

Mr. HALE. Indeed, sir, I do. The Oregon, the Indiana, and the Massachusetts are to-day good ships. They are good navigators. Their gunnery is equal to that of any ship. They will be repaired at a cost of hundreds of thousands of dollars, and, as Sir William White says, they go to make up some of the best ships and fully the equal of the same class of ships that were built when they were built.

Of course we improve, but it is a very great question whether the additional size is of any real benefit. Sir William White believes we reached the limit some time ago, and that the enormous vessels now built are not more efficient than the smaller ships. But every one of our battle ships, properly repaired, is to-day, or will be, ready to encounter not only a voyage around the globe, but if we have hostilities, battle upon the sea.

Mr. PILES. It may be that the repairs to the Oregon have been completed. If so, I was not aware of that fact.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. PILES. I do.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I did not intend to say anything about this particular phase until I should make my remarks to the Senate. The Senator from Washington is entirely right. I point out that the tonnage of the Oregon is 10,300, and if Sir William White thinks it is a question whether or not a 10,000 or a 13,000 ton ship is equal for offensive or defensive warfare, either, to a vessel of the type of the Dreadnought, why is it that his own government is now building scarcely anything but the heavy Dreadnought type and destroyers? I have no doubt he would be very glad to see us not increase our Navy, on the one hand, or to keep our ships at ten or thirteen thousand tons, on the other hand.

Mr. HALE. Sir William White and no other naval authority will perhaps contend that one ship like the Oregon or the Massachusetts or the Indiana is in all respects equal to the Dreadnought, but many naval authorities contend that the amount of money put into two Dreadnoughts would furnish three ships of 12,000 tons, and that they would be, as a collective force, better than two Dreadnoughts. But that is not a practical question, because we have settled that the ships which we are to build in the future are to be of the larger type. But I do not want it to go unquestioned that the other ships are obsolete.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the Senator from Washington will permit me——

Mr. PILES. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. As I say, I did not intend to take this up until I shall speak. But upon this point I should say to the Senator that he will also recognize the fact that other very eminent naval authorities, and perhaps the great weight of naval authority is that one vessel of the Dreadnought type in warfare would probably be equal to four of the Oregon type. Furthermore, the very statement of the Senator that we have now abandoned the former type and determined to build our battle ships from now on upon the Dreadnought type is an admission that the former type is not efficient for modern warfare, and what we now contend for is enough of the modern battle ships.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, I believe in no navy for mere pomp or show. I believe in no great standing army. Happily for our country we need none, because we are unlike those European countries that are compelled, or feel compelled, to maintain equal or superior forces to defend themselves against the standing armies of contiguous or adjacent states.

But, with our immense coast line, unprotected to a very large extent, I believe in a navy sufficient to maintain our peace and to protect our people.

The President, impressed with the great responsibilities of his office and acting under the solemnity of his oath, would not have appealed to Congress in the impressive manner he has did he not feel that there is an imperative necessity for four battle ships. He is Commander in Chief of the Navy, and his recommendations on a question of such vital importance to us as a nation are entitled to weighty consideration. They should not be disregarded, except upon a clear showing that the President is absolutely wrong.

This is not a question of policy with respect to a subject of general legislation which may be modified or repealed at a subsequent session of Congress. It involves more than that. It involves the dignity of our nation and the peace, honor, and welfare of our people. For myself, not being able to foresee what the future may bring forth, I would rather be wrong in voting for four battle ships, if events should prove me wrong, than to take the present risk of being right in voting for two. If subsequent events should prove the correctness of the President's position and the incorrectness of the Senate's, if the amendment be defeated, it will then be too late to remedy the evil or repair the wrong. If I err, I prefer to err in providing too much rather than not enough for the common defense and the peace of all. If I should be wrong in voting for four battle ships, I may safely charge my mistake to an error of judgment; but, if wrong in voting against four battle ships, I could find no excuse, justification, or forgiveness.

Believing, as I do, profoundly in the peace of our country, believing that peace is for the best interests of all the world, I have felt it my duty to present this question to the Senate, and I feel it my duty to vote to sustain the President of the United States as Commander in Chief of the Navy in his appeal to Congress to give four battle ships instead of two as "a measure of peace and not of war." [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair admonishes the occupants of the galleries that under the rules of the Senate applause is not allowed.

Mr. PILES subsequently said: Since concluding my remarks I have received a letter, with accompanying resolutions. I ask that the letter be read and that the resolutions be printed at the end of my remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE NATIONAL BUSINESS LEAGUE OF AMERICA,
CHICAGO STOCK EXCHANGE BUILDING,
Chicago, U. S. A., April 23, 1908.

Hon. SAMUEL H. PILES,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: In re the battle-ship measure now before the Congress, I inclose copy of a resolution adopted by this league and indorsed by business interests all over the country five years ago. There has been no change in public opinion since, except a general conclusion that the demand for increased naval equipment is more imperative than ever before, and it is hoped that, with either our Atlantic or Pacific coast line practically unprotected against foreign invasion, our national legislators will not overeconomize at this critical junction.

Yours, very truly,

A. A. BURNHAM, General Secretary.

The resolutions referred to are as follows:

A GREATER NAVY.

Preamble and resolutions unanimously adopted by the standing committees of the National Business League.

Whereas the United States, with a coast line of nearly 6,000 miles, not including indentations of the land nor the boundaries of our island possessions, and with a foreign commerce which is exceeded by that of only one other nation, and, furthermore, is pledged to the maintenance of the Monroe doctrine, whereby the right to acquire territory upon the Western Hemisphere, either by purchase or conquest, is denied to any foreign power; and

Whereas the United States is in possession of a naval equipment which, in ships, officers, and men, is numerically inadequate as compared with the naval strength of several other countries and entirely insufficient for our protection in times of war, or for the enforcement of law and the preservation of order in our oversea territory; and

Whereas President Roosevelt in his second message to the Fifty-seventh Congress, after warm commendation of the efficiency of the naval force of the nation in proportion to its size, directs attention to its insufficiency and recommends its continual increase so as to keep pace with our commercial growth, as follows:

"There should be no halt in the work of building up the Navy, providing every year additional fighting craft. We are a very rich country, vast in extent of territory, and great in population; a country, moreover, which has an Army diminutive when compared with that of any other first-class power. We have deliberately made our own certain foreign policies which demand the possession of a first-class navy. The Isthmian Canal will greatly increase the efficiency of our Navy if the Navy is of sufficient size, but if we have an inadequate Navy, then the building of the canal would be merely giving a hostage to any power of superior strength. The Monroe doctrine should be treated as the cardinal feature of American foreign policy, but it would be worse than idle to assert it unless we intended to back it up, and it can be backed up only by a thoroughly good navy. A good navy is not a provocative of war. It is the surest guaranty of peace:" Therefore be it

Resolved, That the standing committees of the National Business League do hereby recommend that Congress make early provisions for the enlargement of the Navy of the United States until it shall become able to successfully cope with the naval equipment of other nations; also that all battle ships, cruisers, gunboats, torpedo boats, torpedo destroyers, and other weapons for naval purposes shall be, so far as possible, of domestic material and construction: And be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be presented to all members of the Senate and House of Representatives at Washington, to commercial organizations throughout the country, and to the public press.

NATIONAL BUSINESS LEAGUE.
ERSKINE M. PHELPS,
President.
E. ALLEN FROST,
General Counsel.
ALEXANDER H. REVELL,
Chairman Executive Committee.
EUGENE J. BUFFINGTON,
Chairman Finance Committee.
LA VERNE W. NOYES,
Chairman Committee on Manufactures.
ELLIOTT DURAND,
Chairman Committee on Commerce.

Attest:
AUSTIN A. BURNHAM, General Secretary.

CHICAGO, ILL., U. S. A., February 24, 1903.

Mr. HALE. Let the pending amendment be reported.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment at the request of the Senator from Maine.

The SECRETARY. On page 85, line 17, after the word "constructed," it is proposed to strike out "two" and insert "four," so that if amended it will read:

The President is hereby authorized to have constructed four first-class battle ships, to cost, exclusive of armor and armament, not exceeding $6,000,000 each.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. President, I reside in a State which has no seacoast, but I take a deep interest in all legislation which concerns the interests of the whole country and which I think will be beneficial. I have always been in favor of a large Navy. In the Fiftieth Congress I supported and advocated the first appropriation that was ever made for the construction of a battle ship. Nearly twenty years have passed since that time, and I have watched with pride and pleasure our growing Navy. I have taken a deep interest in everything connected with our Navy. I have watched, too, Mr. President, the great battle-ship fleet which the President sent into the Pacific waters, and I indorse the action of the President in sending that fleet to the Pacific Ocean. I believe it has been of great benefit to the officers and men, and I believe also that it has been a benefit to our nation in showing to the world what a great Navy we have.

Mr. President, the leading nations of the world are increasing their respective navies. I desire to see this country, by proper legislation, gradually increase our Navy. The United States now ranks as the second naval power of the world, Great Britain being the first naval power. I have before me a statement which was presented by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs a few days ago. It appears that Great Britain has fifty-six battle ships, thirty-eight armored cruisers, while the United States has twenty-nine battle ships and twelve armored cruisers. Coming next to the United States is France with twenty-seven battle ships and twenty-three armored cruisers; Germany with twenty-eight battle ships and ten armored cruisers; Japan with thirteen battle ships and thirteen armored cruisers; Russia with nine battle ships and seven armored cruisers; Italy with thirteen battle ships and ten armored cruisers, and Austria with three battle ships and three armored cruisers.

I have referred to the comparative naval strength of the great powers of the world in order that I might show that while to-day we occupy the position of the second naval power, France has within two battle ships of as many as we have and Germany has within one, and unless we make a proper appropriation and provide for four battle ships, our country may drop down and no longer be the second naval power, but be in the third or fourth class. I desire to see the United States of America first in everything. I desire to see our progress, if possible, superior to that of any other country, and I am opposed to permitting the United States of America to retrograde in anything.

We can not expect at present, and it is not desired, that we have as many battle ships and armored cruisers as Great Britain, but when we remember that the population and wealth of the United States is nearly double the wealth and population of Germany and nearly double the wealth and population of France, we should be encouraged to increase our Navy and be convinced that the statesmen and lawmakers of those nations appreciate the necessity and benefit of a large navy.

I am in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington to provide in the naval bill now under consideration for four battle ships. If we provide for but two battle ships in this appropriation bill, we will be sure to provide for two more next year. The important question therefore is, Shall we provide now for four battle ships and have them all completed as soon as possible or only provide for two? If it was necessary we could raise 100,000 soldiers for the United States Army in a few weeks. We could raise 500,000 soldiers for the Army in the United States in a few months, but several years will be required to provide four battle ships. Therefore I repeat, if we are going to provide for two more battle ships next year in addition to two this year, it is best to adopt the pending amendment, which provides for four battle ships.

Mr. President, I am in favor of peace. Twenty years ago I advocated peace and arbitration at the other end of the Capitol. I had the honor to be the author of the bill to provide for an international American conference, commonly called the Pan-American Congress, in which seventeen nations were represented, and the two great questions provided for in that bill which became a law were arbitration for the settlement of international disputes and the encouragement of reciprocal commercial relations.

When I advocate a provision for four battle ships in this bill, it is not because I think war is imminent. I do not believe that war is imminent between this country and any other country. I am in favor of peace, and I believe that a great navy will help to maintain peace. I believe that a great navy will not invite war, as some have alleged, but I believe that it will promote peace. Although the outlook does not indicate war, we have to admit that war is possible. No cloud of war was in sight one month before the Spanish war began—unforeseen, thrilling, and remarkable events suddenly precipitated a war.

The Venezuelan incident which some years ago threatened to cause war came suddenly and unexpectedly, as did also the San Francisco incident. It is the part of wisdom to be ready.

The last war that the United States participated in was a naval war, and I believe the next war, if we have war soon or if we have war in the future, however remote it may be, will be a naval war.

Mr. President, we should have a Navy that is commensurate with our needs. The day may come when we will want a Navy in the Atlantic and a Navy in the Pacific. I do not think that time has yet arrived. I think if we provide for four more battle ships we will have as many as we need for the present. Two years from now we may need more, but we should provide for a Navy that is commensurate with the needs of our country. The world should know that we love peace and that we are also prepared for war, and then we will have peace with honor.

The President of the United States in his message to Congress earnestly recommended that Congress provide immediately for four additional battle ships. He is, under the Constitution, the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. He knows the diplomatic situation. He knows the demands which should be promptly met, and I believe he is prompted by patriotism and the highest and best motives and the Senate of the United States should comply with his recommendation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question in on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES].

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, last night when the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES], at a late hour, offered his amendment and made the reasonable request, so usual in this body at the end of a long and arduous day, that it might go over until this morning, the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], in courteously and politely acceding to that request, said that he would do so and should not himself consider it necessary to discuss this question, because, as he said—

> I shall see no reason for consuming the time of the Senate upon a matter as to which I presume its mind is already made up.

I quote his exact words as reported in the RECORD.

I know, Mr. President, that the Senator did not mean a certain interpretation which might be put on those remarks by persons unkinder than myself. It is inconceivable that in this body, which has come to be known as "the greatest deliberative body in the world," a question involving, in the opinion of its Chief Magistrate, the defense and honor of the nation, should be determined without any deliberation at all. It is inconceivable that the Senate of the United States in what the future may show to be one of its historical moments has "made up its mind" before a fact has been adduced, before an argument has been presented, before one word of discussion has taken place.

So I am very sure that the Senator from Maine did not mean that the Senate had "made up its mind" without consideration. Surely he did not mean that this "greatest deliberative body in the world" is a mere automaton whose votes are herded and cast as the strings are pulled. No, I am sure he meant merely that Senators have had sufficient time, and each of them for himself has read all the arguments upon either side, and from the abundance of their information have made up their minds in advance; and that so completely were they posted that no further discussion was necessary or desired. Of course that is what the Senator meant.

I think it would be fortunate, Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. So far from in any way by my action last night at the end of a very wearisome day undertaking to prevent any discussion, I consented at once——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly; I said so.

Mr. HALE (continuing). To the proposition of the Senator moving the amendment that it should go over. I knew what the Senator from Indiana intended, as he had a right to do, to debate the subject and to give us one of the great speeches of his life, as he always does, and I entered no demurrer to that, and no objection. I simply did venture to say that so far as I am concerned I did not expect to take any of the time of the Senate upon this amendment, for the reason that I did not think it needed it.

It is not a new subject, Mr. President, as the Senator knows. It has been uppermost and talked about in the newspapers, and discussed at length after a most animated contest in the other branch, where it was decided by an overwhelming vote. It must be assumed that unless Senators have either failed to read the accounts and the news and the debates, or are waiting to hear what the Senator from Indiana will say before they vote, it is not in any way contemptuous of the right of debate that I said what I did.

The Senator ought not in any way to give the impression that I was trying to cut off debate. I presume most of the debate will be upon the side the Senator espouses so ably, as he always does. But the Senator must not be concerned if Senators on this side do not feel that it is necessary to take up the time of the Senate in answering him. I do not know but that other Senators do propose to answer him. My mind is made up on the subject, and it was made up a long time ago. While I shall listen with pleasure to the Senator I do not think that even he can convert me. All I meant last night was to indicate that so far as I was concerned I did not care to take the time of the Senate.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Maine for illuminating my poor remarks with his all too lucid explanation. The Senator will bear me out, for he is listening to every word, that I especially acquitted the Senator from indicating that "the Senate had made up its mind" before debate had taken place, although that is the language which I read from the RECORD that the Senator used last night.

As to what the Senator says about the kind of speech that I am going to make, that compliment, of course, I appreciate. But it shows the same knowledge of the future that the Senator indicated last night when he said that without a word of debate upon one of the gravest subjects that can come before us the "mind of the Senate was made up" in advance. Nor does the fact that the House has passed the measure in a certain form relieve us, as the Senator seems to indicate now, from our constitutional right and our constitutional duty to consider it separately. Is not that why the Senate of the United States was instituted, and has not the discharge of that function been one of its greatest virtues and one of its greatest glories?

I repeat that in stating that "the Senate had made up its mind" without a word of discussion or a word of debate or a moment of deliberation upon a question which every foreign cabinet in the world is now watching for our decision, I entirely acquit the Senator of the imputation which those remarks might bear in some less kindly quarters, that the Senate was not what the American people have been proud to call it, "the greatest deliberative body in the world," but, as I said a moment ago, an automaton whose votes might be gathered and cast not by their judgment or their study. I distinctly said that I had no doubt the Senator merely meant that every one of the Senators here had heretofore read the evidence in this case privately, had considered the arguments pro and con, and needed no further light or thought. And each Senator knows in his own mind and heart whether that is just what he has done and whether or not the vote he casts is upon that kind of preparation.

I am sure that that is what the Senator from Maine meant, and that therefore, perhaps, although we who are speaking for this great measure may be merely speaking against a Senate already convinced in a silent and secret way—of course by their study and by their books—yet we may be permitted to go on merely as a matter of justice to ourselves and our record before the nation and before history.

But, Mr. President, too much time is consumed upon that, and I wish to come directly to the question.

"THE TRUE GRANDEUR OF NATIONS."

One of the first great pieces of literature that attracted my attention as a youth was the historic oration of Charles Sumner on the True Grandeur of Nations. It is one of the six greatest utterances that ever fell from human lips. There he summed up in words whose brilliancy was almost inspired all the arguments for peace. That great address has affected the sentiment of the world against war more, perhaps, than any utterance that has ever fallen from the lips of man. To that doctrine, from that day to this, I have heartily subscribed. It entered profoundly into my soul, and from then till now has influenced my judgment and my life.

With the single exception of honor, peace is the most desired thing upon this globe, and the recommendation of the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy of the Republic upon which we are soon to vote expressly states that it is in the interest not of war, but of the nation's peace.

Mr. President, one argument strikes us with mountainous distinction at the beginning of this discussion. The other day the Senator from Maine said that "war is impossible." "Where," said he, "will those legions come from?" We have heard that sentiment echoed in conversation in this Chamber. Every Senator who has personally spoken to me as intending not to support the President's programme of peace with honor has given as his chief reason that war is out of the question—impossible.

I hope that is true, but Senators must follow the logic of their premises. If "war is impossible," then every dollar that we vote to build up a navy is so much money filched without reason from the pockets of the people.

If war is "impossible," as I hope it is, then whenever we appropriate a single dollar for a single ship we take it out of the pockets of an industrious people for no purpose. So, if that argument is true, it is not only an argument against four battle ships; it is an argument against two battle ships, or one battle ship, or a single vessel armed with guns or covered with steel.

If, on the other hand, war is possible, then our Navy must be kept upon the basis of that possible contingency. Will any man say to-day that he is willing to stake his reputation and judgment for the future upon the assumption that our Navy is now adequate to answer in any war that may arise? If not, he condemns his own vote.

So if I believed that "war is impossible" I would vote against any Navy appropriation whatever. But if war is possible, then we must follow our logic and vote for a Navy commensurate with that possibility becoming an actual fact. Can any man escape that logic?

Mr. President, it is easy in times of peace to sneer at the possibility of armed conflict; but war, as was pointed out by the learned Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], who never speaks in this body on any question without enlightening and informing his colleagues, wars have usually been sudden, just as personal conflicts between men. Those who foresee them and prophesy them are usually laughed to scorn by those who claim that peace can not possibly end. But examination shows that in our own brief history as a nation the wars that we have had have suddenly sprung up when men were proclaiming they could not occur; and our history is full of instances where the most unexpected occurrences brought us to the very verge of battle.

TROUBLE WITH ALGIERS.

Go back, Mr. President, to our trouble with Algiers. The Tripolitan power was ravaging the seas, and within a brief time that war sprang into flame. There was where the gallant Decatur made for his name immortal fame; and it was on that occasion that his utterance also became immortal—"Our country, may she ever be right; but right or wrong, our country!" Yet statesmen, as wise as the Senator from Maine, said that that conflict was "impossible."

Then, again, there were the embargoes early in our history which furnished the occasion for one of the most historic decisions of our Federal courts and almost precipitated us into a serious conflict, and no man could have foreseen six months in advance that it was upon us.

The proposition I am now discussing is the point made out by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] the other day, that wars in this country and wars in history—as I shall show from the Senator's own statement in a moment—have been unanticipated by many of our wisest men.

I now come to an instance which is within the memory of every man here, however young. That was the famous Mafia incident in New Orleans. In that case, Mr. President, several Italian subjects were murdered by a mob in Louisiana. The Italian Government the very next day demanded that justice should be meted out to the murderers on the one hand and an indemnity and apology should be made upon the other hand. The Italian minister pointed out what was undeniably true, that an express treaty stipulation had been violated; the treaty stipulation being that Italian subjects in this country were guaranteed the same protection that American citizens were guaranteed in Italy. No statesman, nothing short of omniscience, could have foreseen twenty-four hours before the event the action of the New Orleans mob.

THE MAFIA INCIDENT.

A protest was immediately made. Mr. Blaine replied that an outrage had occurred within the jurisdiction of a State, and that it was beyond the power of the American Republic, with whom Italy had the treaty, to carry out the provisions of that treaty to bring the offenders to justice, and denied their right to indemnity. The diplomatic correspondence continued for some time. The upshot was that the Italian minister was withdrawn from Washington. I have here his notification of withdrawal. He sent a note to Mr. Blaine saying that, in view of the strained relations of the two countries, or words to that effect, he was directed by His Majesty to leave the American capital.

That is how near, Mr. President, we were on the verge of conflict within twenty-four hours before which no human being could have foreseen its possibility. Finally the dispute was settled by the American Republic agreeing to Italy's demand and paying the families of the murdered Italian subjects $25,000, or something like that, in indemnity.

MR. CLEVELAND AND VENEZUELA.

Then, the next incident, Mr. President, was the famous Venezuelan matter. I hold in my hand an account of that. I will venture to say that seven days before Mr. Cleveland sent in his historic message—the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] was here, and should know, as is true of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], and other veteran Senators—no human being here or abroad could possibly have foreseen the message of President Cleveland.

Everybody remembers—all of us can remember—the tremendous wave of excitement that swept over the entire nation. I have always thought it was nothing but the forbearance of Great Britain and her statesmen, who, upon second thought, modified Lord Salisbury's first fervent language of indignation, that saved us from conflict. I will take the time of the Senate to read a brief account of this, because the opposition to the President's course has chiefly been put upon the "impossibility" of conflict; and I am showing how we have been on the verge of it, when no man, a few hours before, could have known it. Speaking of Mr. Olney's coming into office:

The vigor shown by Mr. Olney when Attorney-General, in enforcing law and order during the Chicago strike, he now displayed in conducting foreign affairs. With a boldness going to the extreme limit of diplomacy he insisted, on the ground of the Monroe doctrine and of our essential sovereignty upon this continent, that Great Britain should submit to arbitration a long-standing boundary dispute with Venezuela. This being refused, Mr. Cleveland on December 17, 1895, sent to Congress a startlingly bold message on the subject, which rent the air like a thunderbolt. A declaration of war could hardly have produced more commotion. After recommending the creation of a commission to determine and report upon the true division line between Venezuela and British Guiana he said: "When such report is made and accepted, it will, in my opinion, be the duty of the United States to resist, by every means in its power, as a willful aggression upon its rights and interests, the appropriation by Great Britain of any lands, or the exercise of governmental jurisdiction over any territory, which, after investigation, we have determined of right belonged to Venezuela."

In the whole history of this Republic there never has been used language by the Chief Executive which was so near in itself a declaration of war. Our present President has been accused of violent language in delicate situations. I have, for the purpose of looking that over, gone carefully over his public papers and public addresses, and I can find nothing but guarded language. Suppose he to-day were to issue a message like the "conservative" President Cleveland—a message in which I am inclined to think, as the American people did at that time, that President Cleveland was right—he would be denounced from one end of the country to the other as a man who was plunging his country into the throes of war; and so the message of President Cleveland almost did. I think it was only the forbearance and the long and farsighted policy upon the part of the British statesmen that averted it. Here is what follows:

The two branches of Congress vied with each other in rallying to the President's support. The Commission was provided for at once by an act unanimously passed in both Houses, neither pausing to refer it to a committee. Wall street, however, took the other side. It was estimated the American securities fell in value from $300,000,000 to $500,000,000 in consequence of the message.

Mr. President, the next trouble that all of us have immediate knowledge of is the San Francisco affair. I shall take no time to describe it. It has upon this floor been many times clearly and startlingly set forth. The treaty, as claimed by Japan, was violated; as claimed by us, it was not. If it had not been for the final forbearance of the people of San Francisco in executing what they thought their constitutional rights, if it had not been for the delicate address of the President of the United States in handling that great question, there would have been a casus belli; and everyone knows that, not only in this country, but in every capital of Europe, everybody was discussing the possibility of armed conflict.

Mr. President, it was pointed out the other day by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] that our dual form of government makes our foreign relations difficult. Not forever can we depend upon the idea that foreign nations are going to consider that their treaties are not violated when their subjects are killed within our borders merely because it happens within a State; and if they should take the opposite view, whether right or wrong, war would be upon us.

Let me give an illustration, which I think will clearly show this fact to anyone; and do not forget that what I am trying to show is that in the past, and therefore in the future, the causes of war, and the conflict itself, spring up like a sudden flame from a match dropped in a pine forest; and the wisest of men declare them "impossible" even when the guns are being prepared for action.

Suppose, Mr. President, that in the State of California, or the Senator's State of Washington, or in any Pacific coast State, the race conflict should produce the lynching of a Japanese subject, as so many colored men have been lynched both North and South—suppose such a thing should happen for any reason and it were seen that the murdered man was not to blame; does any person doubt that Japan would demand redress? Does not everybody know that we could not give redress under our former interpretation of our dual system of government? These are matters in which war's possibility slumbers and which Senators upon their conscience, considering the safety of the Republic, have no right to sneer at or laugh at, and can not deny.

A POSSIBILITY NOT TO BE DENIED.

Mr. President, if time permitted, I should go on for a considerable space examining the history of our country upon this question, showing that in every conflict we have had clear up to the outbreak of the hostilities, in this Chamber and in the other Chamber, able, learned, and patriotic men have always said in every single instance that war was absolutely "impossible;" and yet within a few days we would find ourselves engulfed in its red torrent.

Now, Mr. President, concerning that very subject, in the Revolution right down to its outbreak—I have the books downstairs and could read them, but you must take my statement—it was predicted by the most conservative men in the colonies that there would be no break with Great Britain. It happens to be a fact of history that that war was fought and our independence won by the commonest of the common people in this land, led by a man who did not belong to that class—George Washington. It happens to be a fact of history that the commercial class of New York at that time were absolutely against the colonists; that they did not furnish a regiment or a company, and that the Declaration of Independence was itself opposed because it would "hurt business." On every hand there were able, sincere men who said that the Revolution was an "impossibility," and that nobody wanted to sever from the mother country; and yet the Revolution came.

Then, again, the same thing was said in fervid speeches concerning the Mexican war; and yet the Mexican war came. Then in the civil war down to within six months of that conflict there were eminent men who declared it could not and must not come, and that all talk of it was what was called in Boston "rubadub agitation;" and yet the civil war came, came with all of its dreadful horrors, came with all of its glories for the soldiers who served on each side of that historic strife.

Mr. President, we do not need to go back to that to show that the prophets of peace, who always have been laughing down the "possibility of war," are not entirely accurate. I hold in my hand the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I quote from the able speech made by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] prior to the outbreak of the Spanish war, where he says:

There never was a war that had in it the elements of an honest and sincere struggle for liberty against oppression that did not arouse not only the sympathy, but the active aid of hundreds and thousands of gallant men, and this insurrection—

That is, the Cuban insurrection—has excited none of that feeling in this country.

That is what the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] then said.

SPANISH WAR NOT FORESEEN.

The Senator at that time was very anxious that war should not come. I happened to be, in my humble way, as a private citizen, in exactly the same position. Those who were hounding President McKinley to put forward a war were, in my judgment as much as in the judgment of the Senator from Maine, very imprudent, to say the least; and yet this instance shows how the most careful men may be wrong about a historic incident, for within two or three months from the time the Senator from Maine uttered that speech we were engaged in the Spanish conflict.

Then I remember another thing. I went some years ago, in 1901, through Manchuria before it was opened to the world. I believe that I was the only person permitted to do so while it was still closed. An English officer was arrested near Mukden and sent out of the country. Mr. Wirt Gerrare, another Englishman, went through disguised. When I got through there and after a visit to Japan, I came to the conclusion that war between Russia and Japan was absolutely certain.

Upon returning to America I put my views and the reasons for them in writing in magazine articles. I remember of having talked to certain very eminent gentlemen in public life at that time, who were literally contemptuous of the possibility of that dreadful conflict that later came. I said at that time that it appeared to me, from an examination on the ground, that war must come in five years—and war did come in exactly five years. The Senator from Maine will remember that later on, about the time these papers were consolidated into the form of a book, I had a very long conference with him upon the question whether, after all, that great conflict was possible.

He showed me so convincingly that it could not come; that the financial situation in each country was such as to make it "impossible;" that the enlightened opinion of the world would prevent it, that I actually modified the chapter upon that subject, saying that it was a "probability" instead of a "certainty;" and yet in three months from the time of that long and, to me, most interesting and valuable conference, war between Russia and Japan was filling all the East with its thunders and the rivers of Manchuria with blood. So we see how mistaken the Senator then was as to the "impossibility of war."

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I do not remember the conference as distinctly as the Senator has stated it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It made an impression on me.

Mr. HALE. But I have no doubt the Senator is correct, and that I did not at that time suppose that a needless war would be precipitated between those two peoples. What I am now thinking of is not whether either the Senator or I guessed right about that war. We did not appreciate the nearness of the two countries and the inevitable questions that had already arisen, and which would not down, nor did either he or I appreciate the aroused spirit of Japan, not intense for conquest then, but the proper national self-assertion and power to maintain it that had grown up in Japan. Neither the Senator nor I guessed right, because we did not appreciate the situation.

I wish now the Senator would tell the Senate whether he thinks there is the slightest similarity between the conditions then existing enveloping the action both of Russia and of Japan, near neighbors, contending about contiguous territory, with a hostility that had been developing for years, and when the Senator was as confident that there would be no war as he was that Russia would prevail if there were war——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator is wrong in both those statements. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE. Then I take that back. I certainly got the impression that the Senator believed that Russia would prevail. I certainly believed so.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. On the contrary, I believe it is true that I was the only writer upon that subject, excepting only Colonel Gadski, of the German army, who said there was any possibility of Japan's winning the contest; and, furthermore—and it was referred to after the war had ended by an editorial in a prominent paper—I SAID IN MY BOOK that Japan could in three weeks land an army corps in Korea and establish and defend a line of transports. More than that; I said in my book that Japan could occupy Korea and drive the Russians back in Manchuria and that the Russians would have——

Mr. HALE. Well, I did not know——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The other point about which the Senator is wrong is this: I did think, not only that war was not possible, as the Senator says, but that it was absolutely certain. Five years before it took place, in published magazine articles, I said that within five years there would be war between Russia and Japan. I modified that only three months before the war occurred because of the long conference which I had—and I always seek them—with the Senator from Maine, whose wisdom I then followed, and follow now wherever I can, if my reason permits me. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE. I did not know that the Senator had taken this matter up and predicted it five years before. I did not know that he was such a long-range prophet. But the essential thing now is—and I should like the Senator to tell the Senate—whether he thinks there is any similarity between the conditions that enveloped both Russia and Japan, which resulted in war by Japan moving first, and the present conditions affecting the United States and Japan.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator first makes a statement and then asks a question. I will take them in their order. He says that we were both mistaken; that we had not rightfully appreciated the situation, although the searchlight of the world was directed upon that spot. That is precisely the point I am making. I am trying to show that the gravest wisdom, the most careful foresight, the most experienced statesmen—and it does me great pleasure to say the Senator from Maine is a high example of them—have often been mistaken in their forecasts of conflicts.

The Senator by his remarks now shows what I am trying to prove, that if the Senator was then mistaken he has only been one of the great company of statesmen which through all history have been similarly mistaken as to the possibility of war; and we can easily see why humane men with tender hearts, such as that of the Senator from Maine and all Senators here, shrink from the possibility of conflict. We wish it will not come, and therefore we think it will not come, and in the instance mentioned is a splendid illustration before us of how even the wisest and most careful men, such as the Senator from Maine, may be mistaken concerning the most dreadful events.

Now, as to the question the Senator asked me, if there is any similarity between our position with any power and that of Japan and Russia, Mr. President, the Senator will certainly agree, on second thought, that that is a subject into which we can not here go. He well knows that it is impossible for any Senator on this floor, even in executive session, to analyze the possibilities of conflict with a now friendly power, specifically naming it. When I read the debates in the House, admirable as I thought those debates were, it was a source to me of sincere regret that powers were mentioned by name and the certainty of conflict pointed out. I only wish it were possible, for purposes of discussing this solemn prayer to us made by the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy under his constitutional duty to the Republic, to discuss certain questions. But we can not specifically do so. We can do so in general only.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Pardon me a moment. The limit of our debate is to point out in this public way the necessity for our preparedness and the extent to which other nations, now, and as we hope always to be, friendly, have themselves prepared. What the Executive may have in his possession no man knows. Doubtless he has his reasons. Since I have read that message I have gone over the other messages of President Roosevelt, and nowhere can I find the solemn words which he there uses, and that is the reason why I do not answer the second question of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I agree entirely with the Senator that to discuss and point out these specific dangers, the imminence, the threat of war with any nation, under existing circumstances, is not a question we should go into here in open session, and ought not to often, except under the greatest stress and provocation, in executive session.

I should not have put the question to the Senator if he had not labored so continuously upon the danger of war, the possibility of war, the likelihood of war, as the strength of his case for the larger increase of the Navy.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. HALE. And the instance——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I was willing for the Senator to interrupt me. May I not interrupt him?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Is there any other legitimate excuse for our building a navy at all?

Mr. HALE. Oh, no; I do not agree with the Senator in that.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am asking the question.

Mr. HALE. I think there is a point we can reach, which we have reached, where we have a sufficient navy for defense; and we have no war. But that is not what is between the Senator and me now. The Senator persistently rested his case upon the danger of war, the likelihood of war, the instances whence sudden war was precipitated upon us, and while he did not in terms select the nation, the people, though he did by reference, he made this whole question revolve around the possibility or probability of a war as the reason why we should increase the naval establishment.

I am sorry he did, Mr. President. I think that in itself is an alarming thing. I do not think that condition—and I have no right to arraign the judgment of the Senator—and that danger should be too much pushed if there is any sensitiveness anywhere; and it was only because of that that I asked the other question, which the moment I asked it I saw I did not want the Senator to answer.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator, without any intention, evades the point I was making. The Senator, however, in doing so, again repeats the chief argument of those who are against granting the Commander in Chief's request by saying, a moment before he sat down, that we can not possibly have any war.

I started the debate by saying that if that is true, then every cent devoted to the Navy is filched from the pockets of the people. If it is not true, and war is a possibility, then the Navy must be upon the basis of that possibility becoming a fact. It was to show that it is unsafe for us as legislators to go upon the prophecy that "war is impossible," which the Senator has again made, that I have been citing all these instances, ending with the Senator himself showing that the greatest statesmen of our history have been mistaken about that fact. That, therefore, destroys the argument that Senators may have for voting against the President's request, because if the greatest statesmen in this country, including the Senator from Maine, have been emphatically mistaken upon that question, we must not trifle with the interests and the safety and the honor of this Republic by going upon any such assumption. That is the point I was making.

Now, then, in reference to the rights upon this floor, as to what I think we should do, I think we can examine the state of preparedness of other nations. I think we can use them as an example. But so far as I am concerned, I do not think that in this open forum or even in executive session we ought to discuss the probability of conflict with any specific power. I think if we could freely do so, there would not be very many votes against this proposition.

I concede that a number in the Senate of the older Senators, the veteran Senators, whose excellent examples I have before me, take the other view, that there can not possibly be any war; and yet there is an eminent weight of authority to the contrary. I have here what I am going to have read merely because it is from one of the most eminent public men in the United States. It was made in a public speech, and repeated in a public speech, and printed conspicuously in a Washington newspaper. I send to the desk and ask to have read the extracts marked "1" and "2" in their order from the speech of Mr. Justice Harlan of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read, as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. Justice Harlan, addressing the delegates to the third annual banquet of the Navy League, held at the New Willard last night, looked into the future for a few years and saw there the threat of a "yellow peril," which shall involve this earth in the most frightful war in history. The rugged old justice, "a soldier of the civil war and not a Jingo," he said, drew a picture of what our Navy should be, and why it should be what he advocated.

There were other speakers at the banquet, which was preceded earlier in the day by receptions to the members of the Navy League by President Roosevelt and Admiral Dewey. Other speakers there were besides Mr. Justice Harlan, but they were speakers who took perhaps the same view as the great Kentuckian on the need of an increase in the Navy and who saw no such yellow-lined clouds in the Far East as he saw and spoke of to those present.

* * * * * * *

There is no such thing as friendship between nations as there is between men.

Do you think that England cares a cent or that Germany cares a cent about the increase of our Navy?

Their respect for us depends upon their belief that we can take care of ourselves. I want to see our Navy such that no nation on the earth could think for a moment of forcing a contest or entering into a contest with us.

I do not say that we will have war in the near future, but looking into that future it seems certain that there will be a conflict some day that will shake the earth. If it falls upon us, and I do not say that it will, I want to see our country in a position to meet it.

I want to see the country in such a position that no nation on earth can ever dare to go against it. I want to see $50,000,000 a year for ten years spent on our Navy. I said that one year ago at a banquet of this league, and I wish to say it again.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Those are not the words of an excitable man. They are not the words of an alarmist. They are the words, most maturely considered—because the justice says he has repeated them twice—of one of the greatest justices that ever sat upon the bench of the Supreme Court.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Indiana that the conservative author of that article is no more conservative than was the distinguished Senator from Vermont, Mr. Proctor, whose utterances upon this floor just preceding the Spanish war, in my judgment, did more to bring on that war than anything that took place in the country that year. I remember very well his remarkable speech, without any attempt at oratory or embellishment, in which he related in this Chamber a tale which it was my pleasure to hear. I had heard the facts stated by him denied again and again by Senators here, and that simple, plain story of the actual condition which existed in Cuba really provoked our controversy. To the honor of his memory be it said that he spoke truthfully, fairly, and justly. Now, if the Senator will permit me for a moment further?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I dissent wholly from the idea that war is at all imminent. I do not see a single war cloud——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not think so either. My argument has been upon the contrary.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not see a single cloud in the world's horizon which menaces our peace or our good order. I could not justify my vote in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Washington upon any theory that we are near war or that it is at all remotely possible. But I will base my vote, if I shall vote for this amendment, upon the idea that the President of the United States, who has the direction of our diplomatic affairs in his hands, has asked that it be done; and it is just possible that the President may desire this done in order to aid in the accomplishment of some diplomatic advantage to our country with which we are not familiar and about which perhaps we have no right to inquire.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I agree with all the Senator has said, and I am very much obliged for his most informing interruption. I shall not now quote any more eminent authorities, but I quote this one merely to show that all the opinions as to the possibility of war are not upon the side that it can not possibly occur. I am quoting Justice Harlan to show that one of the most eminent men in the nation thinks differently from the Senator from Maine; and where great, honorable, patriotic men differ, we have no right to trifle with possibilities. That is the point. And all of this was done because the argument has been made time and again that such a thing is not possible. I am showing to the contrary.

This thought occurs to me in that connection. Justice Harlan was a soldier, a great soldier, and I observe that the men who are most determinedly against war are the men who themselves have tasted its bitterness, and they are the men who want to take measures to prevent it. They know its horrors.

The justice whom I have quoted is a man of perhaps about the same experience in public affairs as the honorable and distinguished Senator from Maine, but he went through four years of desperate conflict. He knows what it means, and in reading literature upon this subject I have found that not only are those men who have been in the war the most fervid apostles of peace, but that knowing what war really is from personal experience they also know how to take a definite and concrete means to prevent it.

NAVY INSURES PEACE.

This is not a war measure. Senators, THIS IS A PEACE MEASURE. A big navy insures peace. That, Mr. President, is the consensus of practically every statesman in the world. Since the debates in the House I have been looking up as carefully as I could some of the statements of foreign statesmen as well as our own upon the subject. Every one of them wants peace and every one of them regards an adequate preparation for defense as the greatest guaranty of peace. A big navy would have saved us from war and humiliation in 1812. At that time the British inflicted upon us a humiliation that still burns in the blood of every American. They destroyed our cities; they came up the Potomac and captured and burned the Capitol of the Republic. They drove the Administration out. We would have had no war if we had had at that time a powerful navy.

I have had it stated to me by men whose judgment I am compelled to trust, not excitable men, men careful, studious, experienced, that had we had three more first-class battle ships before the Spanish war, that whole controversy would have been settled as the Senator from Maine so wisely labored to have it settled, by the peaceful methods of diplomacy instead of by battle on land and on the high seas. It was believed in every admiralty of Europe that the navies of Spain and the American Republic were nearly equally matched, and Spain was literally driven to a test of strength. Four more ships of the first class would have shown to the world that she was overmatched. She would have been excused in the opinion of nations in determining that conflict by means of diplomacy. But we did not have the four battle ships.

Mr. DIXON rose.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Excuse me for a moment. There was at that time the same resistance to an increase in our Navy that there is now. We heard the cry of "economy." While those battle ships would have cost us a few millions, they would have saved hundreds of millions of dollars and thousands of lives. On which side lay the "economy" in that proposition?

Now I will hear the Senator from Montana.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from Indiana has described how narrowly we averted war with England during the Venezuelan trouble.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes.

Mr. DIXON. How many battle ships did we have at that time?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. During the Venezuelan affair?

Mr. DIXON. Yes. Did we have any?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not know. At that time—it is to the eternal honor of the Democratic party—the Navy had just begun its modern building.

Mr. DIXON. How many war vessels did we really have?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not know; and I repeat what I have twice said, that after President Cleveland's message, which historians call a practical declaration of war, conflict was averted only by the self-restraint, the settled policy, and the foresight of British statesmen, and not at all because of the fact that we were weak on the water. Lord Salisbury at first flung back our challenge in our teeth, but after they had considered what the future held forth, what they hoped to be the relation of that nation to our own, it was forbearance which prevented conflict and not our weakness.

Now, I want to call attention——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am perfectly willing to yield; I invite all interruptions; but merely to ask questions.

Mr. BACON resumed his seat.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do hope the Senator will present his question.

Mr. BACON. It is immaterial.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Now, I will give another illustration. After Japan's war with China Japan exacted as her indemnity the cession of the Liaotung Peninsula. That is the peninsula on which Port Arthur is located. It is perhaps the richest portion of Manchuria. After the cession had taken place, Japan was compelled in a subsequent treaty to recede the Liaotung Peninsula to China. It was the recession of that peninsula, the robbing of Japan of the fruits of her victory, that brought on the Russo-Japanese war.

Very well! Had Japan at that time had the navy she now has, she would never have been compelled to give up the Liaotung Peninsula and Port Arthur. She was forced to do it by a demonstration in her waters of the strength of the combined navies of Russia, Germany, and France.

The only reason she yielded on the one hand and the only reason the other nations made their demonstration to force her to yield on the other hand was her naval weakness at that time. Had Japan at that period had the navy she has to-day, the Liaotung Peninsula never would have been taken from her, a casus belli never would have existed between her and Russia thereafter, and the greatest conflict of modern times would have been averted by the ownership by Japan of six battle ships at the end of her war with China.

Does it impress Senators as to the importance of building battle ships, when we consider the treasure that Russia spent, the treasure that Japan spent, or the treasure lost that would have been saved as a matter of history by six battle ships at the time Japan was forced to give up the Liaotung Peninsula?

Again, after Japan had been forced to give up the Liaotung Peninsula, had Russia, before the outbreak of her war with Japan, had a great first-class navy in Asiatic waters there is no question in the mind of any student of eastern and oriental diplomacy that the difficulties between Russia and Japan would have been settled by diplomacy instead of upon the battlefield. These are illustrations vividly in the minds of all of us that a few battle ships on each side would have saved the conflict at last and the cause of it at first.

Mr. President, most wars of recent times have been settled by their navies; and what has been the cost of these wars? We talk about the great expense of four battle ships. Those four battle ships, as I have shown, before we had our war with Spain would have settled that conflict by diplomacy. We did not have them. We got into the conflict because of that.

What was the cost of that in money by the lowest estimate? More than one billion dollars, and those who take another view of it from what I do place the cost at more than $1,400,000,000.

Was that all? No; the life of every soldier who fell beneath the flag.

AN ECONOMY.

"Economy!" "A stitch in time saves nine." Four battle ships, costing a few million dollars, would have saved us hundreds of millions of dollars and thousands of priceless lives in the Spanish conflict.

I am amazed and astounded when Senators talk about "economy" in so grave a question as our national safety and our national honor. It is "economy" to maintain peace. It is always extravagant to go to war. We can maintain peace, as I have shown you from these historic examples in our own experience and under our very eyes, by an adequate preparation for war.

The expense of the Navy! Well, Mr. President, we are not the only good business nation in the world. The English are businesslike, perhaps the greatest commercial nation the world ever saw, and they have the greatest navy in the world. Those hard-headed, conservative business men and shopkeepers of Great Britain have as a matter of financial policy considered that to have a navy double the size of any other European country was for her the greatest "economy."

The English people are perhaps the best merchants the world ever saw, except only the ancient Phœnicians, in whose naval policy they concur. Has anybody ever supposed that they were building their navy for anything but reasons of "economy?" But they have considered the lessons of history, they have considered the lessons of our war with Spain, of Russia's war with Japan, and they have seen that the expenditure of a few million dollars on battle ships so as to make the navy so large that no nation could go to war with them was the best "economy" for their exchequer and the best prudence for the lives of their subjects.

Germany, Mr. President, is supposed to be a provident nation. Has anybody ever heard that the prudent, the saving, the cautious, and the commercial German people were not economical? And yet they are maintaining a great navy. Let no man suppose that it is the opinion of the German Emperor that does this.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. In one moment I will yield. He could not lift his finger upon this great naval national programme if he was not backed up by the German people. Ever since he gave expression to that famous motto of statesmanship with which he started out, "Drang nach oston"—Push to the East—and that other great commercial maxim, "Germans, our future is on the ocean," the German people have been back of him, and have reenforced him in his naval policy; and the German people, economical, prudent, farseeing, businesslike and wasting never a cent, have, as a matter of economy, embarked upon a policy of the greatest possible navy they can have.

Now, I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. PERKINS. I dislike exceedingly to interrupt the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is all right.

Mr. PERKINS. I simply rose to ask a question for information. Great Britain has the largest navy in the world. We are second only to Great Britain. Within the past few years she has been through a great war. I want to ask the Senator from Indiana if her navy prevented her from having the Boer war.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Without her navy she would have been totally helpless in the Boer war. It was her navy——

Mr. PERKINS. It did not prevent it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It did not prevent it, because it was exclusively a land war. It is getting late, or I would cite more examples. I say that but for her navy England would have been engaged not in innumerable, for I want to be moderate, but in numerous wars within the last fifty years. Whether the Senator thinks this or not, that seems to be the view of the British statesmen, backed up by the hard-headed, plodding, slow-thinking, sane, safe, and considerate commercial English people; and perhaps they know their business.

Now, I come to the French. Their providence in money matters is proverbial. Yet I shall show in a moment the number of battle ships that they have now laid down and that they have provided for. France, mark you, is a republic. Germany is a limited monarchy. We all know about England. Is it possible that these three most economical people in the world, in deciding on this great naval policy for themselves, have deliberately determined upon a policy of extravagance? No, Mr. President; they have determined upon a policy which will insure their people peace. That is the reason why they do it.

Mr. President, the frugality of Japan is known throughout the world. Every man who visits that wonderful Empire is consumed with admiration for the frugality as well as for the courtesy and the industry of that people. They are not spending an extra cent where they can help it. Their resources are not great; neither are Germany's resources great. Yet Japan, of necessity having to have an "economical" policy, is also building up a great navy.

Have Senators ever thought of the differences in the resources, for example, of Germany and the American Republic? They are not to be compared, they are only to be contrasted. Yet with comparatively meager resources she is building up one of the great navies of the world. I shall come in a moment to her naval programme.

Take, for example, the navy which Japan is building up. Japan with a niggardly soil upon her hillsides, Japan with not many resources, Japan with few mines, but Japan with a wonderful energy that is capturing the markets of the East—what is she building a navy for? To use it against anybody? To use it against China? No; for China has no navy. To use it against England? No; for England is her ally. To use it against France? No; for she makes loans in France. To use it against Russia? No; because Russia's navy is destroyed. To use it against Germany? No; because their interests do not conflict. Against whom, then? Against us? Certainly not. We are on friendly terms and I hope always shall be.

Mr. KEAN. We have Japanese loans also.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Perhaps we have. I do not know how much loans we have; but, anyhow, it could not be against us, because we are friendly. We opened their ports to the world.

Now, then, for whom is this great navy being built by Japan? Why, it is too clear. It is not being built for anybody. They are just wasting the people's money on purpose. They are building a navy as a practice, an adventure. It is too plain that they can not use this navy against anybody. It is too plain that the statesmen of Japan are taxing their people until those people's backs are bending under the burden for no purpose on earth.

Mr. President, I want to call attention to what we have paid for our Navy compared with other powers. I have heard that we have made extravagant appropriations. I have the figures here. It is just as well to consider figures once in a while in their large meaning. I find that the estimated wealth is, of the United Kingdom, $59,000,000,000; France, $48,000,000,000; Germany, $40,000,000,000; Italy, $15,000,000,000; Russia, $32,000,000,000, and the United States $107,000,000,000.

According to our comparative wealth which our unprotectedness lies open to attack, our expenditure for naval appropriations for 1904, the time these figures stand for, was a fraction under one-tenth of 1 per cent, while that of Great Britain was over 2 per cent, that of France was 1.3 per cent. Ours was infinitely less, not a little less, not twice as small, but tremendously smaller than the appropriation of any other naval power in the world compared with our resources.

Now, I want to call the attention of Senators to another fact. In the last seven years Great Britain has spent in her naval programme $1,200,000,000. The total appropriations for the United States Navy, beginning with 1883 (the practical beginning of the new navy), up to and including June 30, 1907, amount to $1,244,651,029.94, or the same amount practically that Great Britain has spent in the last seven years alone.

Great Britain has spent in seven years last past as much as we have spent in the last twenty years, from the time that William C. Whitney began the construction of our modern Navy. This covers a period of twenty-four years, and represents all appropriations of every kind for naval purposes, including the conduct of naval operations during the war with Spain.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, I am sure he does not mean to do an injustice——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; I do not.

Mr. LODGE. To the ex-Secretary of the Navy. The new Navy was begun by Secretary, afterwards Senator, Chandler. The first three ships were built under his administration, and he did what was even more important—he secured from Congress the percentage limitation on the repair of ships, which put the old ships out and enabled us to get new ones.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am very glad indeed for the Senator's correction. It has been stated so often, and it illustrates the point in this debate, that Mr. Whitney was the founder of the new Navy that I have taken it for granted, as I have seen so many things taken for granted here that are not investigated. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE. When the Senator arrays the expenditures of Great Britain, and says that in the seven years they have spent as much as we have spent in twenty-odd years, he must remember that a very much greater part of England's expenditures is made upon the maintenance and running of her immense fleet already built, and extending back for years. But if the Senator will take the programme for the building of new ships for the last five, six, seven, or eight years, aside from the running expenses of the Department, he will find an entirely different condition. I have it here stated.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I have it. It is 25 per cent of the total.

Mr. HALE. I am not talking about the total.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am talking about new construction.

Mr. HALE. In the last few years we are beating all the world except England, and I think we are almost or quite up to her on new construction.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No, Mr. President; I have the figures here.

Mr. McCREARY. The Senator from Indiana was just referring to the commencement of the new Navy. There is no doubt but that the appropriation of money was made and the first battle ship was built while Mr. Whitney was Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Now, Mr. President, I will not dwell longer upon the financial side of this question. I have shown the tremendous economy in actual cash, in human life, and in the progress of civilization itself which a comparatively small expenditure would have made in the recent history of this country, of Russia, and of Japan.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. GORE. I merely wish to inquire whether it is the practice in Japan to let contracts for battle ships exclusively to Japanese contractors, requiring them to be built exclusively in Japanese shipyards, or whether the Japanese Government lets contracts for battle ships to other bidders, without reference to the residence, citizenship, and nationality of bidders or the location of the shipyards?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will say to the Senator that I have a very distinct impression, an impression so distinct, I will say, I might call it a fact—but I am determined this afternoon to be careful about every statement I make—that Japan has every Japanese shipyard filled with new construction of battle ships, and that, in addition, she is building so rapidly that she has had one, and possibly two, constructed abroad. At all events, the building of the new navy of Japan is proceeding with great speed. That is as near as I can answer the Senator.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. HALE. The question raised by the Senator from Oklahoma is answered, I think, by the statement that the internal development of Japan has been such that within the last two or three years most of her building is in her own yards. Before that she went outside. I suppose what the Senator wanted to establish was the fact that Japan did not insist upon building everything at home with home material. That is undoubtedly true, but more so in the past than at present. However, the extent of the real programme of Japan is not so great as the Senator from Indiana believes. But that will be brought out later in the debate.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. GORE. I desire to ask the Senator from Maine a question. Is it true that Russia has recently contracted with English shipyards for the construction of six large battle ships, exceeding, I believe, the capacity of the Dreadnought?

Mr. HALE. No; I do not think that is true. It has been rumored, but there is no proof that it is true. Russia has made contracts heretofore and is now making contracts outside of her own country and her own yards. In fact, our yards have furnished ships for Russia.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Now, Mr. President, I come to the question of the comparative navies of the world as they are building to-day. It must be remembered that since the Russo-Japanese war the question of naval warfare has undergone a revolution, just as is always the case after a great war, and there is progress in naval construction. It is now considered by every naval authority in the world, I believe, without exception, that the approved type of a vessel both for offense and defense is the great battle ship of the Dreadnought type.

England has or is building of this type eight great battle ships unequaled in the world, the Dreadnought, the Temeraire, the Bellerophon, the Superb, the St. Vincent, the Vanguard, and the Collingwood, and has one more on this year's programme. She is also building what are called great armored cruisers, but those armored cruisers are equivalent to a battle ship. I have it upon the highest possible authority that within two weeks a great constructor of the British navy, who perhaps I ought not to name, has declared in private conversation that there is no substantial difference between the battle ships of the Dreadnought type and the armored cruisers of the eighteen and nineteen thousand ton type. It is a very easy device to which nations resort to call a new vessel not a battle ship, but a cruiser.

Of these cruisers she has now or building five, making substantially in all thirteen of the most modern and powerful battle ships in the world.

Of France there are six of the Danton class. That is, nearly 19,000 tons.

Mr. LODGE. Before the Senator leaves the English list——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. England has one of the large type of the Dreadnought afloat; she has three building, and three authorized, but not begun.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And one more. That is what I said.

Mr. LODGE. I do not find the one more.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am very much obliged to the Senator for confirming my own information.

Mr. LODGE. She has only one afloat and three building; that is all.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I said, and my words can be proven in the RECORD, that she has either building or afloat——

Mr. LODGE. Four.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Building makes it more important than if they were already afloat, because they are on the stocks. She has all told, authorized, building, and afloat, eight.

Mr. LODGE. The eighth I do not find on this list.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I have this authority directly from the Department itself.

Mr. LODGE. This is the official list that I hold in my hand, and I am looking for the eighth, but I do not find it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. There is one more, and I shall tell the Senator how he will find it. It is on this year's programme. You will find it under that caption.

Mr. LODGE. It is not yet adopted.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. Parliament has not passed the naval estimates this year.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But it will pass it. There is no question about that.

Mr. LODGE. I am not speaking about what it will do.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from Maine gave a statement of the Navy a moment ago and included these two battle ships.

Mr. LODGE. They have not begun on them yet.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But they have authorized three or four.

Mr. LODGE. Now, about the cruisers. I only find three large cruisers.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. There are three of the Invincible type and two of the Lord Nelson and Agamemnon type, which makes five.

Mr. LODGE. The Lord Nelson is a battle ship and not a cruiser, and is no bigger than our Connecticut. She is not of the class I am speaking of—armored cruisers. The Shannon, the Minotaur, and the Defense are 14,000-ton cruisers. The only three big cruisers are the Indomitable, the Inflexible, and the Invincible, and those are building.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think my information, which I am giving now—and the Senator is confirming it—is quite as accurate as that the Senator can have; and I find in this statement——

Mr. LODGE. I am not confirming it, I think.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then, overthrowing it—whatever the Senator is doing.

Mr. LODGE. I am only trying to get the facts.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not know whether the Senator is insinuating that I am not giving the facts here or not.

Mr. LODGE. I am not insinuating anything, Mr. President. I am trying to get the facts as to the number of British ships.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And I am trying to give them.

Mr. LODGE. And I have here before me the official statement, which shows one Dreadnought, three building of that class, and three which are authorized, and it shows three large armored cruisers building.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Now, is the Senator through?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; I believe I am for the moment.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. We have heard the naval policy of these other powers minimized. The Danton class is 18,350 tons. They are practically Dreadnoughts; and there are "six more of 21,000 tons each," which are proposed for this year.

Mr. HALE. France has no such programme as that.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from Maine says that France has not. I say upon the authority which I hold in my hand here, which I am sure is the most accurate that can be obtained by our Government, that France has this programme for this year.

Germany has four now building. The first, the Nassau, has been launched.

Three of programme 1908. Money already voted, and to be begun at once.

For several succeeding years, THREE ADDITIONAL BATTLE SHIPS PER YEAR HAVE BEEN AUTHORIZED.

In addition to these battle ships, armored cruisers to equal the English Invincible have been authorized at the rate of one per year, commencing 1906. THAT MAKES FOUR of the greatest war ships on all the oceans to be builded EACH YEAR.

In Japan the actual facts could not be found, but we all know that they have the "Satsuma (19,200 tons) launched, of the Dreadnought class; Aki (19,800 tons) launched; and two battle ships (about 20,000 tons) to be laid down this summer." The world knows that much; and the world also knows that Japan like other nations know very little of what she really is doing.

That is as far as we can get information concerning the construction programme of the navy of Japan.

That is what other powers are doing. Why, then, should Senators hesitate about these four battle ships?

Consider Brazil. Even Brazil is now building in England three battle ships of 19,200 tons each—three Dreadnoughts. That is Brazil, mind you.

Mr. HALE. How many has she got now?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not know how many she has got now. Perhaps she is just building as we began to build our Navy some time ago. I shall come to our Navy in a moment.

When we find just what the naval programmes of other nations are, we find that this request of the President is modest compared with what they are actually doing.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes; I do.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Indiana has evidently given great attention to this subject, and I hope, before he concludes his remarks, he will give us the benefit of his advice and judgment about how large a Navy we ought to have.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes; I will. I will, indeed. To begin with, I would say that the first thing is that, considering all that has been stated in figures and facts, we ought to begin it and, if necessary, end it by granting the prayer of the President of the United States, solemnly made to us at this juncture. If it eventuates next year that they are not needed, nothing is lost; we do not have to build any more. If it eventuates that they are needed, our failure to build them or start them will be an error which no sum of money can repair.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes; I do; certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suppose the Senator's information which he has been giving the Senate the benefit of is the result of an original investigation on his part?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is.

Mr. ALDRICH. We are here having a responsibility for legislation which is equal, from my standpoint, to the Executive responsibility, and I hope the Senator will be willing to state what his own personal judgment is about what the size of the American Navy should be, and that he will not fall back upon any other man's judgment, however exalted that personage may be.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will give the Senator my independent judgment; and I am very much obliged to the Senator for his reference to the fact that this represents an original investigation hurriedly made by myself, which it does.

I can say that the limit at this particular juncture, as a matter of independent judgment, which I hesitate and am very loath to give, in view of the naval programmes of other nations, should be not less than four first-class battle ships, and, more preferably, five or six, for this year, at least. Let every other power know, as they will know, that our resources are utilized and ready for conflict, and then, Senators, we shall have no conflict. I do not believe, myself, we shall, and I pray Heaven we shall not.

It is just that feeling in my heart that makes me in favor of four battle ships at this juncture. The Senator from Rhode Island is no more careful of the people's money than I am, nor is the Senator from Maine. The Senator is no more economical than any other Senator here. He is equally patriotic with us. It is a question of peace and a question of economy, not only of hundreds of millions of dollars, but of thousands of lives, that impels me to be in favor of four battle ships. If I had been in public life and had the opportunity before the Spanish war, I would have been in favor of four battle ships.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator bear with me while I ask him another question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I have never been fortunate enough to have been connected in the Senate with any committees which have had to do with naval affairs, but I have taken great interest in discussions which have taken place in this Chamber from time to time, and I have noticed from year to year, sometimes from month to month, the standard of progress in naval construction and in naval vessels has been changed. I have been here long enough to have heard Senators and others discuss this question and decide that a certain type of vessel was the very best and highest type, was a perfected type, and yet it has been stated on this floor to-day by the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES] that the American Navy is composed of obsolete ships.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am coming to that myself.

Mr. ALDRICH. Now, does the Senator believe that we have at last arrived at perfection and that the type of ships which he is now advocating in an indefinite number will not be obsolete next year?

Mr. PILES rose.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Let me answer that. First of all, we are not advocating an indefinite number. We are advocating a definite number for this time, namely, four. Second, we do not propose, at least so far as my mind is upon the subject—and I think it absurd—that there should be a fixed naval programme as to increase or decrease, any more than that a business man should have a fixed idea that he will do a hundred thousand dollars more business this year, and no more and no less. It is a question of wisdom created by conditions.

Third, the Senator asked me if I expect that we have now reached perfection in naval architecture. No. I say to the Senator we have not, nor have we in anything else human. It would be one of the most melancholy incidents of my life if I ever came to the conclusion that we had reached perfection or that human beings ever could reach perfection. There are some who have reached the point where they believe that there can be no more progress in this world; but I am one who believes that there is unending progress. There is progress even in fashions. The Senator would not for a moment think of arraying himself in such clothes as Daniel Webster wore in this Chamber. He keeps up with the styles.

Certainly, there will be changes. It was no doubt thought in the time of the Constitution and the Guerriere that the Constitution was the most perfect type; but the times change; the world moves; humans advance; and we must keep pace with them. Would the Senator say on that point that our Army should to-day be armed with Springfield rifles just because we had them on hand, left over from a former period? Would the Senator say that a farmer ought to stick to the old-style heavy plow, or that he should still cling to the flail, instead of the thrashing machine? Does the Senator think we have reached perfection in agricultural implements and that invention should cease?

Does not the Senator think it is good business for a farmer to get the most up-to-date machines as they appear to till his ground and harvest his crops? Does not the Senator get the newest and latest typewriter that will most easily do his work? Why should we not, therefore, keep pace with naval advance throughout the world? We have the richest country in the world—many times richer in resources than the other powers—and does the Senator think it is economy, just because we have battle ships of a certain type, now out of date, oldtimers, and almost out of condition, and because they are called "battle ships" that we should cling to them? I answer the Senator "No." We have not reached perfection in naval architecture; neither have we reached perfection in anything human; and we never will. That is one of the wisest ordinances of the Creator, that we are to progress, travel, discover, and invent, and then enjoy the fruits of the genius of man.

Now, Mr. President, another consideration—and I want to get through as soon as I can. You will observe in history and from immediate, recent, and contemporaneous facts that it is the nation with the small navy that is always in trouble. Take Turkey. The papers were full the other day of the fact that Italy was sending its fleet to Turkey. We hear that every year. Always some power is descending upon Turkey. Now, I call the attention of the Senator from Maine to the fact that Turkey has absolutely no potential navy, but that she has a navy only on paper.

Mr. HALE. I was going to ask the Senator whether he thinks that it is a pertinent illustration on this question to cite Turkey, which has no navy, as being powerless and defenseless and open to the assaults of other nations, when our nation already has the second navy in the world?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; I will show the Senator in a moment that we have not the second navy in the world.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator think that is a fair illustration under the circumstances?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. We will see. I am pointing that out, I will say to the Senator, to show that it is the undefended nations that get into trouble; that is, to the degree that they are undefended they get into trouble. For example, when Japan had her war with China she had a navy sufficient for that war, sufficient for China; but she did not have a navy sufficient for Russia, Germany, and France combined, and therefore she was robbed of the Liaotung Peninsula. If she had had six more battle ships, she would not have been robbed of it; and there would never have been a Russo-Japanese war. That is what I mean to show.

Take China. If China had had a navy commensurate to meet the navy of Japan, there would never have been any Chino-Japanese war. Every student of history knows that. Take the Central and South American States. They have been unmolested precisely to the extent that they have been powerful. Has any body troubled Chile? I have just cited the instance of Japan losing the Liaotung Peninsula.

Does the Senator, does any Senator—but I will withdraw the question before it is asked—want us to become another Spain? Why, Spain had on paper—and not only on paper, but in the opinion of every admiralty in Europe—a navy equal to our Navy at the beginning of the Spanish war, but as a matter of fact it was obsolete. It was not the "man behind the gun" that lost the battle of Santiago, so far as the Spaniards were concerned. They were brave men; they died at their posts, with few exceptions; but the ships could not move at their registered speed; they were deficient; they were defective; they were obsolete, and while they were all right on paper they were all wrong in battle; and Spain lost her possessions and received the greatest humiliation that ever fell to the proud people of the Cid. Does any Senator want us to go to war with a fleet of that kind?

The Senator from Maine asked the Senator from Washington a little bit ago about our own Navy. The Senator said that we had thirty-one battle ships. Now, Mr. President, that is true, so far as the names on paper are concerned, but of those battle ships eleven, in view of the developments of recent naval warfare, are out of date. They are of too low tonnage. Some of them have been in commission so long that they must soon go out of commission. Six of those eleven are in need of most extensive overhauling. Eleven of our battle ships in a modern war with any modern power would be useful chiefly for coast-defense purposes. Of the remainder of our battle ships, we have but two of the Dreadnought class, and they are building. That is all we have got, and if we authorize four more we will have only six of the Dreadnought class—fewer than any first-class power in the world has, according to the programmes already completed and adopted.

Mr. President, that is all I have to say about our Navy, but I want to call attention to this, because I do not want to leave anything out. I heard a point made on the floor in one of those private discussions that sometimes are so persuasive. It was asked why should we build any battle ships when we are now 1,200 officers short? Why, Mr. President, that we are 1,200 officers short is not the case. In the first place, that estimate includes the full manning of every ship of every kind we have, from the Dakota to a scow, in commission and out of commission. In the second place——

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do, certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire to call the Senator's attention to the testimony of the Secretary of the Navy before the House committee, in which he stated that we were eighteen hundred and forty-six officers short to-day to man the ships we have in service and those that are building.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I knew the Senator was going to make that point, and that is the reason I made it myself. Mr. President, why does not the Senator go further and tell the Senate the Secretary's and the President's reason for that? I hold in my hand a message from the President of the United States sent to us two years ago, and I think he has repeated it once, begging us to pass a law concerning the personnel. There is an abundance of officers in the lower ranks for every ship we have got or contemplate, but Senators and Representatives have not been willing to pass a personnel law so that the midshipmen could take the rank of officers. Every battle ship, I believe, has on board from eighteen to twenty-two midshipmen. There are plenty of officers if you will only give them all rank.

Why Congress has not done that at the repeated demands of the Department and of the President I do not know. There are plenty of officers, but they are young officers. Why do not Senators and Representatives make way for them in active service? The President, in this impressive message which I hold in my hand, shows that by reason of this we show an apparent lack of officers, which really does not exist, because we have the men, but we have not got the rank; that is all.

But he also shows another startling fact. The captains in the navy of Great Britain are of an average age of 35 years; in the French navy, 47 years; in the German navy, 42 years; in the Japanese navy, 38 years, and in the United States Navy, 55 years; and the discrepancies in ages of admirals and commanders is even worse. That is the answer to the statement, which is another paper statement, true on paper but not true in fact, that we have not enough officers. We have enough officers, in fact, if you will give them the rank.

It is strange that America, the youngest nation in the world, should not have her Navy manned by men who are at least as young as those of other powers. The average age of our captains is 55, while that of the English captains is 35. The average age of seagoing flag officers is, in the navy of Great Britain, 45 years and in ours 59 years.

Remove the impediments, and the officers are there. Besides, if you authorize these battle ships, it would take three or four years to build them, and in that time the Naval Academy could graduate many more officers. They are already there and are open to the Navy, and if they are given rank they will add from 600 to 800 or 900 more first-class and well-educated officers.

Here is another consideration that I want to lay before the Senate. If this country were divided by the Mississippi River into two countries, each country would have a great navy.

Each would be rich enough and proud enough to maintain an independent navy as large as the one we now have. Does the fact that we are not a divided nation, but a united Republic, change the fact that we have two great sea lines of the world on two different coasts? Does any man question the fact that if the Mississippi River divided this country in two there would be a great navy on either coast? Is there any reason why there should not be an equally great navy on the same coasts because this country is one country? We have got to come to it.

A FLEET ON EITHER OCEAN.

As I said the other day, the people of the country are demanding that we shall have an equally great navy on either coast. I think the concensus of opinion of the people of America is that the fleet now on the Pacific ought never to leave those waters; and I do not believe the American people would ever permit it to be ordered away if we had facilities there for overhauling it, for cleaning it, and for putting it in repair. The exigencies and the conditions throughout the world, our two great coast lines—coast lines greater than those of any other three nations in the world put together—demand that we shall have as one Republic what we certainly would have if we were two republics—a navy on either ocean.

Now, Mr. President, I wish the attention of Senators to this. I do not know that it will be very influential with their minds, but with my mind it is. We are about to vote upon this naval programme asked for by the President. I ask each Senator when he casts his vote to think of this question: How would foreign nations have you cast your vote to-night? How would England or Germany or France or Japan have you cast your votes, if either one of them could dictate it? Does anybody believe that the chancellors of the world, who are looking on this vote which will occur in a few minutes, would not rejoice if the President's request is defeated?

I think, Mr. President, that in a grave and purely national question like this it is a matter of determining influence, at least to my mind, to vote as the consensus of the American people would have me vote and not as the consensus of foreign statesmen would have me vote.

Here is another question, a practical question, a serious question. Suppose it were possible that that should occur which all of us so fervently pray may not occur, but that which in the past has occurred, certainly and with the wisest men not being able to foresee it. Suppose war should eventuate between us and any country for any cause. What will those who vote against this solemn prayer of the Commander in Chief say to the American people for that vote for unpreparedness? So far as I am concerned, as one who does not want war but above all peace, I do not want that responsibility upon me. It is something that you may smile at to-night, but if that dread hour came, you could not smile in the face of indignation of the American people who would rightfully demand an accounting.

THE APPEAL OF PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT.

Mr. President and Senators, the Chief Executive of the nation, in his capacity as Commander in Chief of the Navy, says:

> There is imposed upon me the solemn responsibility of advising the Congress of the measures vitally necessary to secure the peace and welfare of the Republic in the event of international complications which are even remotely possible. Having in view this solemn responsibility, I earnestly advise that the Congress now provide four battle ships of the most advanced type.

Does any man in any country think that a President of the American people would utter those words lightly? Is any Senator, no matter how much we may get fixed to an idea, willing to say that the President does not know what he is about? I call the attention of Senators to the fact that our present President of the United States is, by the actual record of facts accomplished, the greatest peacemaker in the world. It was upon his brow that the laurels of the Nobel peace prize were laid. It was his arm that stretched out and stopped that awful conflict which set every river of Manchuria running red to the sea and convulsed the world with horror.

Theodore Roosevelt did that. He was the only man in all the world who had the initiative and daring and the confidence of mankind sufficient to do it. His whole record has been that of a man who prays for peace and who compels peace. Is it possible that such a man, a man of whom to-night, regardless of party, all Americans are proud, and who, as one of the first English periodicals the other day said, looms mountainously high as the first citizen of the world, is praying for this little increase to the Navy for light causes?

I call the attention of Senators to the fact that it was he who convened or set those forces in motion that convened The Hague Conference the time before last. It was he who more than anybody else except one ruler of a monarchy urged that the nations should proceed with disarmament. It was his fondest prayer, as the record of his life shows, that that would be accomplished.

At that time he proposed no increase in the Navy. But The Hague Conference met; twice it has met. Twice his best efforts for disarmament have proved fruitless. Other nations of the world go ahead in building up great navies. They have outclassed us completely in modern battle ships. We are not in the second class, in fact. We are not in second place in the Dreadnought class, which is the type of the modern battle ship. No, we are in a far lower position.

Now, when the President, who, as I have said, by the consensus of the world is the first peacemaker on this earth, has failed to get the nations to agree to disarm, and comes and asks for four battle ships to match the six that France is building and the eight that England is building, and the four that Germany will build each year till 1917 (all this, too, IN ADDITION to the mighty and modern navies those powers already have) shall we haggle about the few million dollars that we must spend to build them, which may save, if the Spanish war is an example, hundreds of millions of dollars? Which is "economy?"

I want to say just one word of appeal to my friends upon the other side of the Chamber, and that is this: I think every man knows that this is not a partisan question. War is not a partisan question, once we face it or the danger of it or get into it. We can not "play politics" with a thing of this kind. It is a patriotic question, if it is any question at all. We are trifling with the people and worse than trifling with the people if we are merely doing this for vanity and the "playing of politics." I appeal to all Senators, quite as much to Senators on this side as to those on the other side, because there are many votes against this measure upon this side, let all considerations of partisanship go and regard this question as a question of preparation to preserve the peace. Let us rise to the height of patriotism.

Mr. President, I know the word has gone around to "stand by the committee." It is a cry which I respect. I usually do it myself. I think every Senator of experience here usually "stands by the committee." Usually it is a legitimate cry. But it is not a legitimate cry under these circumstances if you are doing anything more than trifling. If we are in favor of this programme and are in earnest, then it is not a consideration. I do not answer it by an appeal to stand by the President, but I do answer it by an appeal to stand by the country. I do answer it by an appeal to make sure of that peace which we all cherish equally.

LET US ACT SO THAT WAR WILL NEVER COME.

I call attention to the fact as to what navies have done in the past. I wish I had time to refer to it more extensively. But I call attention to the fact that almost from the beginning of history clear up until the present time it has been the navies which have defended liberty and advanced civilization. It was the navy of the Greeks at Salamis that drove back the Persian invaders. It was the navy of Octavius at Actium that overthrew the combination of Antony and Cleopatra. It was the Christian navy of Venice which at Lepanto drove back the Moslem hordes, saved Europe for Christianity, and changed the history of the world. It was the navy of England which at Trafalgar first halted the power of Napoleon and started his inevitable fall.

It has been our Navy that has won every one of our foreign wars. If there is no possibility of war—and I hope there is not—then every dollar that is spent for this purpose is a theft of the people's money. If there is any possibility of war, then our Navy ought to be upon a basis equal to it.

Mr. President, I have concluded. We ask these ships not for war, but for peace. With all my soul I pray God that war may never come; but let us to-day act so that war never can come. If it does come, we can not build ships when hostile guns are thundering. The conflict would be ended before a keel could be laid. We can not buy ships during the struggle; they are contraband and prohibited.

The Commander in Chief solemnly asks for these ships. The American people, as shown by the clippings which the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES] has read, ask these ships.

Senators, they ask them of us in the name of peace, which these ships will guarantee and preserve.

They ask them in the name of the nation's interests, which the very existence of these ships will secure from molestation.

They ask it in the name of the nation's honor, which these ships will guard, uphold, and defend.

They ask it in the name of the women and children who will be made widows and orphans if war should ever come; and our votes to-night should be that such a war never may come.

This hour may come to be historic. Our gallant American Navy is itself on its knees before the American Congress begging for this reenforcement. Its Commander in Chief is praying for this reenforcement. The American people—Senators, do not doubt it—are demanding that we accede to their request. History sustains them all. The future warns us to take this measure of simple prudence. Let us do it, Senators. Let us do it, and build such a white squadron that it may always be painted in the white garniture of peace and never with the dull tints of war. Let us make our Navy so powerful that the flag above it will float over the most modern navy of the most modern of peoples—a people that will do no wrong or injustice to anyone and that will suffer wrong and injustice from no one.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, it is so late that, while I hope the discussion is nearly at an end, it will be impossible to finish it to-night.

Mr. CULLOM rose.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Missouri desires an executive session, and I suppose the Senator from Illinois rose to make such a motion.

Mr. CULLOM. Yes.

Mr. HALE. Very well.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, April 25, 1908, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate April 24, 1908.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 24, 1908.

[Continuation of the legislative day of Monday, April 20, 1908.]

The recess having expired, at 11.30 o'clock a. m. the House was called to order by the Speaker.

RAILROAD TRACKS TO WASHINGTON NAVY-YARD.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill H. R. 20120, which was, by unanimous consent, substituted for the bill originally embraced in the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH].

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. PAYNE. I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Evidently no quorum is present. The doors will be closed. The Sergeant-at-Arms will notify absent Members. As many as favor the motion will, as their names are called, answer "aye," as many as are opposed will answer "no," and those present and not voting will answer "present." The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 249, answered "present" 13, not voting 125, as follows:

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker——
The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?
Mr. BURLESON. For the purpose of presenting a privileged motion under the rules.
The SPEAKER. The Chair will try to recognize the gentleman a little later.
Mr. BURLESON. That is satisfactory, Mr. Speaker.

PRIVATE PENSIONS.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 603) granting an increase of pension to John A. M. La Pierre, with various Senate amendments thereto, and move to suspend the rules and concur in the Senate amendments. If I may be permitted a moment, I will say that this bill contains various pension bills that have passed both Houses. Those bills passed this House as individual bills, and went to the Senate, and were by that body put into an omnibus bill and passed at the same rate as they passed the House.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Hampshire moves to suspend the rules and concur in the following Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. 603) granting an increase of pension to John A. M. La Pierre. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.
The Senate amendments were read.
During the reading,
Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of this bill be dispensed with, the gentleman from New Hampshire having fully explained the object of the amendments.
Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. There was so much disorder in the House it was impossible to hear what the gentleman from Indiana said, and——
The SPEAKER. This is a House omnibus pension bill with Senate amendments, and the motion is to suspend the rules and agree to the Senate amendments.
Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I do not know what the gentleman from Indiana did, but if he did not call for a second, I do so, in order that the chairman of the committee may explain the legislation.
Mr. CRUMPACKER. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that a number of single House bills were embodied in a Senate omnibus bill.
The SPEAKER. The Clerk is not reading anything but the Senate amendments, and it seems to the Chair that as the matter contained in the bill is matter that the House is to vote on, the better practice is to have it read.
Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, undoubtedly.
The Clerk concluded the reading of the Senate amendments.
The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?
Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of securing an explanation of the legislation from the gentleman from New Hampshire, the chairman of the committee and in charge of the bill, I demand a second.
The SPEAKER. Under the rules a second is ordered. The gentleman from New Hampshire is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Mississippi to twenty minutes.
Mr. SULLOWAY. What is desired by the gentleman from Mississippi?
Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. An explanation of the amendments.
Mr. SULLOWAY. I stated it as well as I could that these bills were passed as individual bills by the House, some 400 of them, and they went to the Senate, and without any amendments passed the Senate, and without any amendments come back——
Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, this is a very interesting conversation, but we can not hear it.
Mr. SULLOWAY. The gentleman should come to the front then. That is all there is in it.
Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand from the gentleman from New Hampshire, Mr. Speaker, that these are House bills without any real amendments upon the part of the Senate, which simply passed them in an omnibus shape. I called for a second with a view of having an explanation made to the House. I shall reserve the balance of my time unless the gentleman desires——
Mr. SULLOWAY. I call for a vote, Mr. Speaker.
The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.
Mr. WILLIAMS. This is upon the passage of the bill?
The SPEAKER. This is upon the passage of the bill.
Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I call for the yeas and nays.
The yeas and nays were ordered.
The question was taken and there were—yeas 236, nays 4, answered "present" 27, not voting 120, as follows:

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CAPRON in the chair). The question is upon the committee amendment to the Senate amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, was there a motion to suspend the rules in this case?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on suspending the rules and agreeing to the Senate amendment with an amendment, which has been read.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for a second, in order that the bill may be explained.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rules, the same is ordered. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill as read. Does the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] desire to occupy a portion of the twenty minutes?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I asked for a second in order that the gentleman in charge of the bill might explain it to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CALDERHEAD] is entitled to twenty minutes.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. The suspension of the rules is for the purpose of passing the bill H. R. 1589, which was amended by the Senate and returned to us, and I moved to concur in that amendment with an amendment, and offered as an amendment the bills of the House which have just been read to the House. All of them have been considered regularly by the committee and reported regularly and are on the Private Calendar.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Are these Senate bills with House amendments?

Mr. CALDERHEAD. These are House bills which have just been read as an amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. With Senate amendment and House amendment to the Senate amendment?

Mr. CALDERHEAD. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILLIAMS. All of them are bills which previously have passed the two Houses, each one individually?

Mr. CALDERHEAD. No; this amendment which has just been read to the House consists of bills that have been reported by the Invalid Pension Committee to the House and are on the Private Calendar now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand. Then this bill will have to go to the Senate?

Mr. CALDERHEAD. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman if these amendments include all the bills that have been reported by the committee up to date.

Mr. CALDERHEAD. Yes, sir; by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, not the bills from the Committee on Pensions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill and agreeing to the Senate amendment with an amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, as this is public legislation, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 207, nays 3, answered "present" 17, not voting 160, as follows:

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CAPRON). The question is on suspending the rules, taking from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 17874, and concurring in the Senate amendment, with the amendment just read.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, in order to expedite legislation, I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 207, nays 1, answered "present" 16, not voting 163, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States, was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. LATTA, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On April 19, 1908:

H. R. 15653. An act to increase the pension of widows, minor children, etc., of deceased soldiers and sailors of the late civil war, the war with Mexico, the various Indian wars, etc., and to grant a pension to certain widows of the deceased soldiers and sailors of the late civil war.

On April 20, 1908:

H. R. 17305. An act to regulate the establishment and maintenance of private hospitals and asylums in the District of Columbia.

On April 22, 1908:

H. R. 20310. An act relating to the liability of common carriers by railroad to their employees in certain cases.

REGATTAS OR MARINE PARADES.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 6028) to provide for safety of life on navigable waters during regattas or marine parades.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California moves to suspend the rules and pass a bill, which will be reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor is hereby authorized and empowered in his discretion to issue from time to time regulations, not contrary to law, to promote the safety of life on navigable waters during regattas or marine parades.

SEC. 2. That to enforce such regulations the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may detail any public vessel in the service of that Department and make use of any private vessel tendered gratuitously for the purpose, or upon the request of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor the head of any other Department may enforce the regulations issued under this act by means of any public vessel of such Department and of any private vessel tendered gratuitously for the purpose.

SEC. 3. That the authority and power bestowed upon the Secretary of Commerce and Labor by sections 1 and 2 may be transferred for any special occasion to the head of another Department by the President whenever in his judgment such transfer is desirable.

SEC. 4. That for any violation of regulations issued pursuant to this act the following penalties shall be incurred:

(a) A licensed officer shall be liable to suspension or revocation of license in the manner now prescribed by law for incompetency or misconduct.

(b) Any person in charge of the navigation of a vessel other than a licensed officer shall be liable to a penalty of $500.

(c) The owner of a vessel (including any corporate officer of a corporation owning the vessel) actually on board shall be liable to a penalty of $500, unless the violation of regulations shall have occurred without his knowledge.

(d) Any other person shall be liable to a penalty of $250.

The Secretary of Commerce and Labor is hereby authorized and empowered to mitigate or remit any penalty herein provided for in the manner prescribed by law for the mitigation or remission of penalties for violation of the navigation laws.

SEC. 5. That the act approved May 19, 1896, entitled "An act to provide for the safety of passengers on excursion steamers," is hereby repealed.

SEC. 6. That this act shall take effect on April 10, 1908.

Mr. WILLIAMS and Mr. FITZGERALD demanded a second.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, a second is ordered. The gentleman from California [Mr. KNOWLAND] is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to twenty minutes.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, as the title of the bill recites, it provides for the safety of life on navigable waters during regattas or marine parades. The bill was reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and has passed the Senate. It is designed to be broad enough in its scope to protect life during any important event bringing a great number of vessels together, crowded with passengers, when the ordinary navigation laws do not prove adequate. The bill is designed to meet such conditions as we will have in the city of San Francisco on the 6th of May next. At that time there will probably be in the vicinity of San Francisco over a million people, all anxious to get upon the water and witness the marine parade. The present law provides only for regattas, and you could hardly call a marine or naval parade such as we are going to have in the Bay of San Francisco a regatta.

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is the purpose of the provision that authorizes the President to confer upon the head of another Department, if he deems it desirable, the power that is conferred by this bill upon the Secretary of Commerce and Labor?

Mr. KNOWLAND. As I understand it, for instance, at San Francisco it is desirable to confer that power upon the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why should the Secretary of the Navy have it, if it is not rather for the purpose of magnifying him and giving him some prestige under these circumstances?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Inasmuch as it is to be a naval parade, or whatever you choose to call it, and the Secretary of the Navy will be in charge, he should have this authority. I know of no other reason.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Suppose the President thought it would be a good thing to confer the power on the Attorney-General, does the gentleman think that we should enact a law that would permit the power granted by one official to be exercised by anybody the President sees fit to designate?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I scarcely think that case would apply.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why not confer all the power on the President?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, it was almost impossible to catch the drift of this bill as it was read at the desk, so great was the disorder, and it was difficult to get a copy of the bill. In order to get acquainted with it, I am compelled to read it in my time. There is no other way for me or the House to get at a knowledge of it.

Section 1 reads:

That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor is hereby authorized and empowered in his discretion to issue from time to time regulations, not contrary to law, to promote the safety of life on navigable waters during regattas or marine parades.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is one of the numerous bills that have been considered and some passed by the House, vesting legislative powers in an Executive Department, a thing that ought never to be done, or rather delegating legislative power to an Executive Department. These regulations will possess the force of law. It is worse than that. A law can be reviewed in any court, but these regulations can not. The decision of this Executive Department is final and conclusive. If it involves any man's liberty or his property in any way, it is still final and conclusive under the decision pronounced by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Jui Toy, a Chinaman.

The second clause is:

That to enforce such regulations the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may detail any public vessel in the service of that Department and make use of any private vessel tendered gratuitously for the purpose.

In other words, not only is the Secretary empowered to make regulations with the force of law unreviewable by the judiciary, but he is empowered to approve and make use of a private vessel for the purpose of enforcing the regulations, provided it is tendered to him gratuitously. In other words, he makes some arbitrary and irresponsibly owned vessel a marine private detective or a sea marine private policeman.

The clause continues:

Or, upon the request of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, the head of any other Department may enforce the regulations.

A number of people get up a regatta race, and the Secretary delegates the police power on that occasion to a private vessel that may belong to one of the owners of a vessel that takes part in the regatta or may have any other imaginable interest in the termination of the races.

The third clause reads:

Or, upon the request of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, the head of any other Department may enforce the regulations issued under this act by means of any public vessel of such Department and of any private vessel tendered gratuitously for the purpose.

SEC. 3. That the authority and power bestowed upon the Secretary of Commerce and Labor by sections 1 and 2 may be transferred for any special occasion to the head of another Department by the President whenever, in his judgment, such transfer is desirable.

In the first place, the Secretary is himself to enforce it, and then, if he desires, he requests some one else to enforce it, and then the power conferred on the Secretary of Commerce and Labor by the act may be divested under the terms of the act and invested in somebody else whenever, in the President's judgment, the transfer of the power is desirable.

We have gone pretty far in the way of delegating legislative authority under the head of "regulations" to be made and enforced by an Executive Department. Now in this bill we propose to delegate to one Department and permit it to delegate to another; and after it is delegated, or before it is delegated, we delegate to the Chief Executive the power to undelegate it and redelegate it.

Section 4 reads:

That for any violation of regulations issued pursuant to this act the following penalties shall be incurred.

After the regulations are adopted by the Department, or the chief of the Department it may be, they possess the force of law, and then if these regulations are violated, no judicial review can be had, and these men are to be punished in the following way:

A licensed officer shall be liable to suspension or revocation of license in the manner now prescribed by law for incompetency or misconduct.

Well, I see nothing in that. Of course if he is incompetent or guilty of misconduct, that will make him liable to suspension or revocation of license, and this would not seem to add to the manner of suspending or revoking, but only to change the causes for which his license can be suspended or revoked. I am glad to see that, because it will prevent—if the President should take over the entire power delegated to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to himself—it will prevent him from suspending the license of an officer by telegram, as he undertook to do on the Mississippi River not so very long ago.

The next clause is:

Any person in charge of the navigation of a vessel other than a licensed officer shall be liable to a penalty of $500.

Now, $500 is not much money with rich people, but it is a good deal of money with some people. A man is to be liable to that penalty for violating a regulation. A regulation is in this unlike a law; it is not prescribed in the law books and everybody is not presumed to know what it is, and as a matter of fact everybody does not know what it is. It is right hard to find out what regulations are in some cases. Let us read for our own information further:

(c) The owner of a vessel (including any corporate officer of a corporation owning the vessel) actually on board shall be liable to a penalty of $500, unless the violation of regulations shall have occurred without his knowledge.

(d) Any other person shall be liable to a penalty of $250.

The Secretary of Commerce and Labor is hereby authorized and empowered to mitigate or remit any penalty herein provided for in the manner prescribed by law for the mitigation or remission of penalties for violation of the navigation laws.

SEC. 5. That the act approved May 19, 1896, entitled "An act to provide for the safety of passengers on excursion steamers," is hereby repealed.

Mr. Speaker, there is no explanation before this House of what are the provisions of that law that is to be repealed, and although we are supposed to know what the law is and to have knowledge of existing law, as a matter of fact, the best lawyers in the House have not such knowledge, and there are probably not ten men in this House, who are not members of this particular committee, who know what the provisions of the act of May 19, 1896, entitled "An act to provide for the safety of passengers on excursion steamers" are. So that we have no idea of what we are repealing, and the gentleman from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], before he reserved his time, although undertaking to explain the bill, made no sort of an explanation of what the provisions of law are that we are repealing.

Mr. KNOWLAND. That is printed in the report, and if the gentleman will read the report he will find out.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Read the report! Why, this matter is brought up under suspension of the rules, with twenty minutes' time in which to state objections, if there are any objections, if you can do it. Now, we are told that there is a report somewhere, which, however, was not laid upon our desks when the matter was presented to us. I had to send out and get a bill. That took a long time, and I have had to go through the form of reading it to the House in order to know what is in it myself—much less taking the time to consider the report, which I did not have and have not even now. If somebody had not jumped up at once after the gentleman had stood upon his feet for only two or three minutes going through the form of explaining, nobody could have read either the bill or the report, for then, having reserved the balance of his time, the next thing in order would have been for the gentleman to call for a vote on the proposition, without any opportunity for the House to know anything at all about it. I will ask the gentleman in my time to tell me what the provisions of the act of May 19, 1896, entitled "An act to provide for the safety of passengers on excursion steamers" are. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] has meantime, however, brought me the report, which contains the act, and I will read it, so that the House may know what it is. In the absence of the safeguards of usual and orderly procedure, done away with by the special rule, I or somebody must do that. I do not know whether any of you know what is in this act that we are about to repeal or not. I know I do not. Let us therefore find out.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. May I interrupt the gentleman a moment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I want to say to the gentleman that this bill came from the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee and that I voted against it and gave notice that I would resist it on the floor of the House. It has not been called up heretofore by unanimous consent, before that rule was dispensed with, because of my objection; and if the gentleman has not had his attention already called to it, a section of the bill permits not only the fixing of regulations that amount to crimes by the Secretary of the Navy, but permits that, by order of the President, to become a migratory power, and the President may transfer that power not only from himself, but from the Secretary of the Navy to some subordinate party.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I just mentioned that peculiarity of the bill a moment ago, and I am delighted to know that the gentleman from Georgia had reserved the right to oppose the legislation. I will read now to see what we are repealing, in order that the House may know something about it, and then I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia:

Be it enacted etc., That in order to provide for the safety of passengers on excursion steamers, yachts, oarsmen, and all craft, whether as observers or participants, taking part in regattas, amateur or professional, that may hereafter be held on navigable waters, the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered in his discretion to detail revenue cutters to enforce such rules and regulations as may be adopted to insure the safety of passengers on said excursion steamers, yachts, oarsmen, and all crafts, whether as observers or participants, taking part in such regattas.

Approved, May 19, 1896.

Now, I confess—and I will ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] to enlighten me—I confess that I am somewhat at sea. This act of May 19, 1896, was also an act that had vested discretion in the Department to make regulations, was it not?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I think so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What was the necessity, in this change, of leaving out excursion steamers, as seems to have been done?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I will say to the gentleman that there is a kind of prestige desired to be conferred upon the Secretary of the Navy, that he may have the power to make these regulations that are tantamount to criminal statutes.

Mr. MANN. Of course the gentleman means the Secretary of Commerce and Labor?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Oh, I understand that; but section 3 permits the President to transfer it to the Secretary of the Navy; and that was the statement that the Commissioner of Navigation made before our committee, and they were so surprised——

Mr. WILLIAMS. This power previously was vested in the Secretary of the Treasury, was it not?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Yes. He could detail revenue cutters.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, they are going to cut out the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to detail revenue cutters and allow some private concerns of some sort to volunteer for this work——

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. And any Department official, whether the Secretary of the Navy or a clerk, can do it under this bill.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. I think the gentleman is in error in regard to the regatta matter. The regatta regulation gives the Secretary of the Treasury power to regulate all crafts upon the waters during a regatta. The naval vessels going into the waters of different cities of the Pacific coast can not be called a regatta, and yet there will be thousands of crafts of all characters and description in these different waters where the naval vessels come.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Speaker, the President of the United States is Commander in Chief of the Navy of the United States and the Secretary of the Navy is the executive officer under him to control and regulate the Navy of the United States. If pleasure occasions of any sort are to occur in which the naval vessels are to participate the Secretary of the Navy has already the right to order them to participate or not to participate, and if they do participate he has the right to state how they shall participate, because the Secretary of the Navy has absolute power, subject to the President's supreme authority as Commander in Chief of the Navy, to control the movements and operations of naval vessels.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I did not catch the exact terms of the law that it is proposed to repeal, and I would like to ask the gentleman if that law does not provide——

Mr. KNOWLAND. If the gentleman——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Two gentlemen can not talk at once. I have yielded to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Does that law provide for certain regulations in connection with excursion boats?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. And this bill, without providing for such regulations, proposes to repeal them?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think so, and upon that I will ask the gentleman in charge of the bill, Does not the present bill repeal so much of the act of May 19, 1896, as applies to excursion steamers and puts nothing in lieu thereof?

Mr. MANN. Of course it covers the whole question; I mean the present bill.

Mr. KNOWLAND. There is ample provision in this bill to cover the whole matter.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What does the gentleman say? I did not hear the gentleman, there is so much disorder.

Mr. KNOWLAND. There is ample provision in this bill to provide for all that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, unless my memory fails me, and I have just read the bill, there is no reference in it to excursion steamers at all. If the gentleman can find any reference to them, I will stand corrected. Now, the law which is proposed to be repealed, the act of May 19, 1896, did refer to excursion steamers, and this law expressly says that that law is repealed. Now, I would like to know why excursion steamers were left out of the regulations.

Mr. MANN. I do not know how far the gentleman is really wanting information on the subject. He is usually wanting information. Under the title of "C" it says "the owner of a vessel," and the making of a regulation under this act covers all kinds of vessels—oh, well, the gentleman nods his head——

Mr. KNOWLAND. It says "during regattas or marine parades," and this covers all kinds of vessels during regattas and during parades.

Mr. TOWNSEND. In other words, it covers all the original bill covered and parades besides.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman from Mississippi yield for a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In just one second.

Mr. Speaker, upon examination of the bill, although excursion steamers are not mentioned eo nomine, I am inclined to think that, taking the first section and Clause C of the fourth section together, if any excursion steamers were present and participating the new law would, under the general heading "Vessels participating," cover them.

Now, I yield five minutes, or such time as he may desire, to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. BURLESON. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] desires some time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the gentleman's pardon. How much time have I left, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One minute.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield it to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. In that one minute I will say that this bill was called up and passed hurriedly in our committee. I protested against it then, because of the fact that it puts the power in the hands of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to make a crime and prescribe penalties, and permits the President to transfer that power from one head of a Department to another at his pleasure. The House when in consideration of a bill relative to enacting laws and fixing penalties to protect the game in Alaska, the very day that we were considering this bill, struck from that bill all provisions like these. Now, while we are all interested in having the naval parade of the ships of our fleet that have gone to the Pacific, in the harbor of San Francisco, as great and magnificent as may be, I am unwilling, even for so great and commendable a purpose, to do that which I think is in violation of the Constitution of my country and the rights of the citizens of the country and put the power in the hands of the head of a Department to make a crime and have that power become transferable and migratory at the will of the President. [Applause.]

Mr. KNOWLAND. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Seventeen minutes.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RYAN].

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Before the gentleman yields that I would like to ask him one question, and that is, What is this third section put in here for? What is the necessity of transferring this power from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to somebody else?

Mr. KNOWLAND. Well, I explained that to the gentleman from New York when he asked me the identical question.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If you have already answered that, all right.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I will answer it again. I will state in this instance, in the case at San Francisco and the time the fleet arrives there, that possibly they may want to delegate that power to the Secretary of the Navy, who has charge of the festivities upon that occasion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. RYAN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. RYAN. I do not believe it will require five minutes to say what I have to say on this question. This bill is simply for the purpose of providing for the controlling of the navigable waters of the United States whenever a marine parade or a regatta is to be had. In my opinion, it is just as necessary to provide regulations for this purpose as it is to provide regulations for the patrolling and maintaining of order in the city of Washington when the inaugural procession is on, or in any other city in the country under similar conditions. The question has been raised here as to why the court will not determine the penalty. As I understand it, for all violations of the navigation laws a penalty is provided, and the same means of removing that penalty is provided for in this act, that is:

That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor is hereby authorized and empowered to mitigate or remit any penalty herein provided for in the manner prescribed by law for the mitigation or remission of penalties for violation of the navigation laws.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RYAN. Certainly.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I understand the gentleman is a member of the committee that reported the bill.

Mr. RYAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. How is that question provided for, and by whom? What machinery is provided for the determination of the question of fact?

Mr. RYAN. The officer of the Department who is assigned to that particular duty. For instance, in the violation of the navigation laws, if it is in the port of New York, the officer of the Government in charge of that port imposes the penalty provided by direction of his Department.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Well, he makes the regulations, and who is it that decides whether or not it has been violated?

Mr. RYAN. The regulations are provided by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor through a committee of chiefs of bureaus in his Department, among whom are the Commissioner of Navigation, Supervising Inspector of Vessels, and others. Penalties are provided in the regulations, and the Secretary of that Department determines on appeal whether or not that fine can be mitigated or remitted. I understand that is the procedure. I do not believe that this bill is improper, as has been suggested. I believe the bill ought to pass. I believe that the condition that will exist in San Francisco Bay when the fleet gets there makes it absolutely necessary that regulations of this character be provided. The conditions will be the same as during the big regattas that are held in New York. There is nothing in the law repealed that is not provided in this law. I do not believe in calling up bills in this manner, but I believe this to be a proper bill and that it ought to pass.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RYAN. Certainly.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Is not this simply an extension of the law that was found so useful in New York?

Mr. RYAN. Yes. It repeals the law of May, 1896, and reenacts this law, which is more comprehensive.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. RYAN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Where does the gentleman from New York find in other statutes a provision giving the President the power to transfer the power bestowed upon the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to make regulations to one of the other branches, to some other official, except in this very remarkable bill?

Mr. RYAN. You must have that power somewhere. You must trust some one, and I am not afraid to trust the President of the United States in matters of this kind.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. What is the purpose of delegating the authority under section 3?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, much has been said about the act of May, 1896. The present bill, pending before the House, is simply an amplification of that act. It broadens its scope. The fleet which left Hampton Roads at the close of last year is now being received on the Pacific coast. It is expected in the harbor of San Francisco on May 6 next. There is no question but there will be thousands of craft in the bay, all anxious to get near the battle ships as they steam in through the Golden Gate. It will be a magnificent pageant, and in all likelihood 500,000 persons will be afloat on excursion steamers and pleasure craft to witness the splendid spectacle. It will be absolutely necessary to have some one in authority controlling these vessels crowded with sightseers in order that there be no accident to mar the pleasure of that occasion. I can remember when the transports returned from the Philippine Islands with our troops, carrying the flags that had been rent by shot and shell in battle in the Orient. Thousands of craft of every description were on the waters of the bay in order to give welcome to the returning heroes. On one occasion a young man named Snow, a bright, able newspaper man, was run down and drowned. He was a young man of exceptional ability. Now, if there had been a law of this kind in force at that time, so that some one in authority could have regulated the speed and the position of excursion vessels of every character and description, the life of that young man would undoubtedly have been spared. I think that this law will do a world of good if it will enable those in authority to see that those men who are reckless of human life are put into their proper places. Much has been said here about the regulation that this bill provides for.

Mr. DENBY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. DENBY. I would like to ask the gentleman what is the meaning of section 3, page 2, lines 21 and 22?

Mr. KAHN. Any other person than the owner or licensed officer?

Mr. DENBY. No; the paragraph before that covers the licensed officer. But this, in lines 21 and 22, "any other person shall be liable to a penalty of $250."

Mr. KAHN. That is, any other person who violates any regulation.

Mr. DENBY. He is fined $250.

Mr. KAHN. It is any regulation that may be in force covering emergencies of this kind.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What other person can violate a regulation?

Mr. KAHN. Well, a man who would probably be in charge of the vessel, and not an owner or licensed officer. Or he might simply have charge of an excursion party, the members of which had purchased tickets admitting them on board of that particular vessel.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the master of the vessel is the man who has absolute authority and is responsible. Now, does the gentleman intend——

Mr. KAHN. There may be a vessel without a master. For instance, there are a great many small craft, such as yachts.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But this provides that there shall be a licensed officer in charge.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It provides a penalty for the violation by a person, any licensed officer in charge, provides a penalty for the owner if he be a corporate officer of a corporation. Now, what "other person" is intended to be covered by that clause?

Mr. KAHN. There may be a small yacht or even a rowboat which carries people and which is not in the possession of the owner or of a licensed officer.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This provides that the person in charge of that boat shall be punished.

Mr. MANN. A rowboat is not a vessel.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What other class is intended to be covered by this last provision?

Mr. KAHN. A rowboat.

Mr. MANN. A rowboat is not a vessel.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Somebody has to be in charge of a rowboat.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has ten minutes remaining.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. HAYES], four minutes.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, I want to remind the House that by the passage of this bill we are conferring no new powers upon the Secretary of Commerce and Labor. We are simply making an extension of the powers already granted, to cover a case which the law now in force does not cover. The law which it is sought to amend by this bill merely provides for regattas, occasions when pleasure craft assemble, and this is intended to cover cases where other craft, including vessels of war, may assemble.

Much has been said by the gentleman from Mississippi and other gentlemen about these regulations. The regulations proposed by this bill are not different in character from regulations that are made now by the various executive officers of the Government. Most of the regulations in regard to navigation are made in the same way.

Mr. KEIFER. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. HAYES. Certainly.

Mr. KEIFER. How would you enforce a penalty against a person who was not a licensed officer? There is a provision here that he may be fined $250 or $500.

Mr. HAYES. That is a matter I have not investigated.

Mr. KEIFER. Where would you institute the proceedings?

Mr. HAYES. I should say in the admiralty courts.

Mr. KEIFER. You do not create any crime. You simply say he shall suffer a penalty.

Mr. HAYES. That makes a crime.

Mr. KEIFER. An admiralty court would have no jurisdiction.

Mr. HAYES. I think it would.

Mr. KEIFER. Surely not.

Mr. HAYES. I am not prepared to discuss that. I only want to say that these regulations are not different in character from the regulations that the navigation officers of the United States make and enforce; and so far as the penalty is concerned, without a penalty a regulation of this kind is a nullity and can not be enforced. It would amount to nothing. You must have a penalty.

Mr. KEIFER. They enforce these penalties on the officers by taking away their license, or otherwise, without going into an admiralty court.

Mr. HAYES. I can not answer the gentleman about that.

Mr. KEIFER. Surely they do.

Mr. HAYES. I know they provide penalties, and the penalties provided by this bill are not different in their character from the penalties provided in the general navigation laws and regulations.

Mr. KEIFER. I think you have no provision here for enforcing any penalty except as to licensed officers.

Mr. HAYES. It does not matter. If there is a penalty for an infraction, there will be some way found to enforce it under the general laws or regulations.

Mr. KEIFER. If you enact a criminal statute, that would go into the criminal courts; but this is not a criminal statute, and they could not go into the criminal courts with it at all.

Mr. HAYES. I repeat that these regulations are not different in character from the regulations that the officers of the navigation bureau make for the enforcement of regulations relating to navigation. There are penalties provided, and they have a way of enforcing them, and the same machinery will answer for enforcing the penalties provided by this bill.

Mr. KEIFER. But this extends those penalties to unlicensed persons.

Mr. HAYES. My time is very limited, and I am sorry that I can not yield further.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield further.

Mr. HAYES. Now, my colleague has referred to a matter that it seems to me is of very great importance. The danger is that on an occasion like that of the coming 6th of May at San Francisco there will be assembled together a great number of vessels of all kinds, and not only there, but when the fleet shall have returned to New York, there will be a similar assembling of vessels there in great numbers. There is to be a great celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of building the first Fulton steamboat on the Hudson River next September. This bill has in view all these things, and I should feel that this Congress was very derelict unless it provided some means of regulating all the kinds of craft that will assemble on these occasions, in order to prevent the great loss of life that is liable to occur unless some one has authority to make and enforce the necessary regulations.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Section 3 of the bill transfers the power to some department to make regulations. I would like to know how these regulations are to be brought home to the people.

Mr. HAYES. The gentleman must know that separate regulations will be necessarily made for each one of these marine assemblages, and they will be brought to the knowledge of the people by proclamation and public notice.

Mr. JONES of Washington. They are put into the hands of the Secretary of the Navy, and he issues them one day and they go into effect the next.

Mr. HAYES. No; the regulations will, of course, be made public in plenty of season, so that all interested may understand them.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I can explain further than has been explained the bill now pending. Under the act of 1896 the Secretary of the Treasury—which meant the Commissioner of Navigation and Revenue-Cutter Service—was given authority to police regattas, and that police work was carried on by the Revenue-Cutter Service. Since that time the Commissioner of Navigation has been transferred to the new Department of Commerce and Labor, and hence this bill in designating the Secretary to act designates the Secretary of Commerce and Labor in place of the Secretary of the Treasury, because the Commissioner of Navigation is the one who really arranges the details relating to navigation.

The existing law of 1896 authorizes the policing of regattas. That work is done, in the main, by the Revenue-Cutter Service, but it has been quite common where such regattas are held to obtain the assistance of private yachts, because the Revenue-Cutter Service could not supply boats enough. This bill repeals the act of 1896 and gives the Secretary of Commerce and Labor the power to police regattas and marine parades. It was believed by the Department that they had no authority under existing law to police the marine parade that is shortly to take place at San Francisco. The bill contains section 3, which authorizes the President to temporarily transfer the power from the Department of Commerce and Labor to the Department of the Navy for this reason. It was not thought desirable that the Department of Commerce and Labor should make the police regulations—and, mind you, that is all that is authorized in this case, just as they make police regulations for any great affair—it was not thought desirable for the Department of Commerce and Labor to make police regulations for the control of the naval ships, and hence it was thought desirable in special cases to allow the Navy Department to make these regulations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LAWRENCE). The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired, and the question is, Shall the rules be suspended and the bill be passed?

Mr. WILLIAMS. And on that, Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It seems to the Chair that the point is well taken. The Doorkeeper will close the doors. The Sergeant-at-Arms will notify absent Members. All those in favor of the motion will, when their names are called, answer "aye" and those opposed "no," those present and not voting will answer "present," and the Clerk will call the roll.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. R. 79. Joint resolution authorizing the widening of the channel of Michigan City Harbor.

COTTON FUTURES.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, under the rules the resolution which I now send to the Clerk's desk is privileged, but in order to expedite action I move to suspend the rules, discharge the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce from further consideration of House resolution numbered 338, and pass the same.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 338.

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be, and he is hereby, requested to immediately inform the House whether the investigation made by the Bureau of Corporations ordered by House resolution No. 795, Fifty-ninth Congress, second session, adopted by the House of Representatives on the 4th day of February, 1907, has been concluded, and if so whether the report on the result of said investigation has been prepared, and if said investigation has been concluded and the report based thereon has been prepared, said Secretary be, and he is hereby, requested to immediately transmit said report to the Congress for its consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LAWRENCE). Is a second demanded?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I demand a second.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second on the resolution. The gentleman from Mississippi, I think, is not opposed to the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule a second is ordered, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] is entitled to twenty minutes, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will be recognized for twenty minutes.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, the report referred to in this resolution has been prepared under the direction of the Bureau of Corporations based on an investigation made with a view of ascertaining whether the fluctuations in the price of cotton have resulted from the character of the contracts, and deliveries thereon, made on the cotton exchanges dealing in futures. The original resolution which was the basis of this investigation was written and introduced by me more than fourteen months ago. It was reported and adopted by the House on February 4, 1907. Those interested in the result of the investigation ordered by that resolution and the report to be made thereon had hoped that the investigation would be had, the report prepared, ready for submission before the beginning of the present Congress. In fact, assurances were given that when the Congress convened last December this report would be ready. The Congress convened, the report was not forthcoming. Upon inquiry at that time, those interested were promised that the report would surely be ready for submission after the holidays. After the holidays the report was not submitted.

Then a promise was given that the report would come by the 1st of February, but it did not come. Then we were led to believe that the report could be expected on the 1st of March, and again we were disappointed. Then it was said that the report would surely be made by the 1st of April, but it was not; and now, Mr. Speaker, information comes that, notwithstanding the investigation has been concluded and the report prepared, the same has in some way found its way into the possession of the Custodian of the Big Stick, where it has been held for a number of days. It is further understood that after the lapse of a stated period parts of this report will be furnished to the press, at the expiration of another period it is to be released for publication, and after that it will then probably be transmitted to us for consideration. Mr. Speaker, this investigation has not been brought about by Executive order, but the House ordered the investigation, and it was for our benefit this report has been prepared. I will not say, Mr. Speaker, that I believe this report will be blue penciled while it is being withheld from us, but I do say, and I say it without hesitation, that the withholding of this report from the House is, in my opinion, a piece of arbitrary meddlesomeness for which there is no warrant.

Mr. Speaker, I introduced the pending resolution eight days ago for the purpose of asking, not for the testimony taken during this investigation, which has been used for the basis of this report, but that the report itself, if ready, shall be transmitted to the House for its consideration.

Mr. KEIFER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; with great pleasure.

Mr. KEIFER. I would like to know whether the gentleman from Texas knows that the report has been prepared?

Mr. BURLESON. I have it upon authority that I do not question that its preparation was completed some time ago, and that it is ready for transmission to the House.

Mr. KEIFER. Then the two things asked in the resolution, as to whether the investigation has been ended, and all that, are already answered.

Mr. BURLESON. I will say to the gentleman that I thought it only proper to embody in this resolution the inquiry whether the investigation had been concluded and whether the report was prepared. If answer can be made that the investigation has not been concluded and the report has not been prepared, then, of course, that would settle it, and the report can not be transmitted to the House.

Mr. KEIFER. I was going to suggest that, inasmuch as there is twenty minutes debate on a side, in that time we might telephone up and find out whether the report has been prepared, if we do not absolutely know it now.

Mr. BURLESON. I will state to the gentleman that in my efforts to secure this report—I wanted it because of certain legislation I had proposed, and I desired the benefit of the facts to be ascertained by the investigation and the disclosures to be made in this report—I have repeatedly asked when it was to be ready for transmission to the House, and, as I have stated, it was first promised in December, and then in February, then in March, then again in April, and now I understand it is in the custody of the Executive, and I doubt whether we ever get it, unless we ask it under a resolution such as I now present.

Mr. KEIFER. If the gentleman changes his resolution——

Mr. BURLESON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I can not now, under the rules, change the resolution. I think this resolution will get what I want and what this House ought to have.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. Speaker, if I understood the gentleman correctly, I understood him to say that he formerly introduced a resolution calling upon the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to give such information as he asked for.

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; in the resolution adopted February 4, 1907.

Mr. GRONNA. Did not that resolution say that the report should be made to Congress?

Mr. BURLESON. It was for the benefit of the House, and the reason I offered the original resolution and had it passed was a desire on my part for an investigation of the methods and practices of cotton exchanges dealing in futures to be made by an unbiased, impartial tribunal, to determine whether their operations had any effect upon the market price of cotton—whether the violent fluctuations in the market price of cotton were occasioned by the exchange contracts and deliveries made thereon.

This investigation, I am reliably informed, made by direction of the original resolution, has been concluded, and a report based thereon has been prepared and has been ready for a number of days, yet it has not been transmitted to the House.

Mr. KEIFER. Have you been refused the report?

Mr. PAYNE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. PAYNE. Does the gentleman think it necessary to censure the executive department in order to get this report?

Mr. BURLESON. There is not a word of censure in this resolution of any of the Executive Departments.

Mr. PAYNE. Not in the resolution, but in the gentleman's speech. I want to say to him that when I heard the resolution read I thought it was a resolution that might possibly be passed, but I do not know whether I will vote for it now or not in connection with the gentleman's speech, because the gentleman seems to think that the passage of this resolution is a censure of the executive department. Of course if he wants this information I do not want to stand in his way, but there is another question I want to ask the gentleman——

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman permit me to answer this one first?

Mr. PAYNE. I was making that by way of suggestion.

Mr. BURLESON. I think the resolution—if the gentleman will permit——

Mr. PAYNE. I would allow the gentleman to do anything in his own time.

Mr. BURLESON. I think the resolution should stand or fall upon its merits. I attempted to give the House candidly the reasons prompting me to introduce it. You may not agree with me. I do not ask every man to agree with the views I express, but when I came to make a statement to the House as to what prompted me to the introduction of this resolution I felt that in all candor I ought to make a full statement—to tell the whole truth about it. I ask no one to agree with me in these reasons, but to vote on the resolution upon its merits.

Mr. PAYNE. But the gentleman made these statements on his information without giving his information. I do not know how reliable the source of the gentleman's information may be, but I want to ask the gentleman another question. If I remember correctly, the reports of the cotton crop were reports of a short crop.

Mr. BURLESON. You mean for this year?

Mr. PAYNE. The last crop.

Mr. BURLESON. No; we had a normal crop this year; about 11,680,000 bales was the yield.

Mr. PAYNE. Is not that less than last year's crop?

Mr. BURLESON. It is only a normal crop. This investigation has no connection with the present crop.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to ask the gentleman whether that had anything to do with the holding up of the crop of the farmers of the South for a higher price, because cotton had gone down from 13 cents to about 9 cents——

Mr. BURLESON. Well, I do not think that the fact that we raised a million and a half bales less this year than last had anything to do with the farmers holding their cotton, but they withheld their cotton from market because they were not satisfied with the price being offered for it. They had a perfect right to hold for a better price, especially in view of the fact that everything they used in raising the crop had increased in value from 50 to 75 per cent.

Mr. PAYNE. Of course they have a right to hold it. I am not criticising that right; but I was fearful that perhaps what I have suggested in the past might be true—that these reports coming out to the farmers might make speculators of the farmers in addition to their raising a crop and result to their detriment occasionally, and it seems to me, knowing how the price of cotton had fallen off this year and that the farmers were holding back their crop, that perhaps, after all, the sending out by the Agricultural Department and getting these reports of the crops, under the various amendments the gentleman has offered in the House for the last five or six years, might not be a good thing for the cotton farmer.

Mr. BURLESON. Well, sir, I do not agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] about the various laws I have fathered during the last few years. The producers of cotton, the farmers, and likewise the consumers, the manufacturers, have commended every law I have placed upon the statute books during the last eight years relating to cotton, and the only objection that has ever been made to these laws has come from those engaged in speculating in this great product upon these exchanges.

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman will except me.

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly; I of course except the gentleman. This resolution has nothing whatever to do with these laws and amendments I have had passed providing for more accurate condition reports and estimates made by the Department of Agriculture, and the ginners' reports, and reports of annual consumption of cotton made by the Census Bureau. It has nothing whatever to do with the size of the crop raised this year nor the market price being received for the crop at this time. The investigation was ordered with the view of ascertaining the cause of the violent fluctuations taking place in the price of cotton and whether the cotton exchanges have contributed thereto. That was the sole purpose of it. I wanted the information to be had as the result of this investigation to see what, in all fairness, we should do; whether we should legislate or attempt legislation upon the subject of cotton gambling. That was the purpose of it, and the sole purpose of it. Now, Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING] for five minutes.

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Speaker, I am in accord with the purpose of this resolution, perhaps not for the same reason, however, that the gentleman has who offered it, but I do want the report from the Bureau of Corporations that was requested by the resolution passed a year ago, a resolution which I had the honor to report to the House myself. I want the information that was called for by that resolution, and have wanted it all this session. The truth is, I suspect, that the report of that Bureau will disclose the fact that they have only investigated in one direction, whereas the resolution called for an investigation covering more than the cotton exchanges of New York and New Orleans. The resolution called for an investigation into the dealing in futures and to ascertain what effect it had upon the price of cotton, or as to the result of any combination or any conspiracy which interferes or hinders commerce among the several States or Territories, or with foreign countries. In drawing that resolution I had view to the fact that there were organizations in the South, as well as exchanges in the South and in the North, that had something to do with holding back the statistics regarding cotton, something to do with reducing the acreage of cotton, something to do with holding cotton back from the markets, and I thought it was no more than fair that we should have a report on both sides of this question. Why this has been kept back I do not know. I have been several times to the Bureau myself to ask for it, and without desiring to offer any criticism at all upon an Executive Department, I am inclined to think that Congress has a right to that report. The report was asked for by Congress, and I feel we are entitled to what the resolution calls for. I shall vote for it and hope it may be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Any time that the gentleman from Massachusetts has left I may want.

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I did not know that such a resolution was pending in the House until to-day. The illness of the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce was probably the reason why nothing has been done by that committee in connection with the resolution. Ordinarily upon privileged resolutions like this the committee would obtain information. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] has never done the members of that committee the honor to call their attention to the resolution. He was not obliged to do so by the rules. He had a right to wait and let them slip by the opportunity to offer the resolution if he desired.

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BURLESON. The reason I did not speak to any member of the committee was that I knew from the public press that the distinguished chairman of that committee was ill, and knowing also that after the lapse of seven days this resolution would be privileged I did not feel that it was incumbent upon me to run about seeking to call together a quorum of that committee.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has stated what I stated before in reference to it. I was not stating it in criticism of the gentleman. The committee has had a session, I believe, every day this week. We would have inquired about it if the members of the committee had known about it. If the chairman had been there undoubtedly their attention would have been called to it. Now, what are the facts? The facts are that Congress created the Department of Commerce and Labor, including the Bureau of Corporations. It was in accordance with the provisions of that law that the gentleman offered a resolution that was passed by the House directing the Commissioner of Corporations to make a certain investigation. The provisions of that law are to the effect that the Commissioner of Corporations shall report such data to the President from time to time as he shall require, and the information so obtained, or so much thereof as the President may direct, shall be made public. Now, I do not undertake to say that the report ought not to be made public. I do not undertake to say that all of the information which may have been obtained ought not to be made public, but I do undertake to say that it is hardly fair to the Administration, while this report and this data is in the hands of the President for his determination, under the law, as to what he shall give out, for the gentleman to insist that the House shall call on the Department of Commerce and Labor itself for this report.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. May I interrupt the gentleman for a moment?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Does the gentleman mean to put a resolution of inquiry by the House upon the same footing with an investigation made in pursuance of that statute? Has not the House the right to inquire and to demand that an investigation made at its instance and direction shall be reported to it and not to the President?

Mr. MANN. Not at all. This investigation was made in pursuance of this law. This House can not by resolution, simple resolution, require any Department of the Government to expend money. The gentleman from Georgia knows that the House is not Congress; the House itself has no control over expenditures of money from the Public Treasury. All that the House can do, and did, was to invoke the law provided on the statute books under which the Department could make the investigation.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Oh, no. The gentleman will permit me to say that the House has the right, has the constitutional right, to demand information of the heads of the Executive Departments.

Mr. MANN. Ah, the House can ask a Department for information that it has in its hands; but the House, by a simple resolution, can not direct a Department to collect information. Now, we passed a resolution—a simple resolution of the House—directing this investigation to be made. How? Under the law which had been provided for that purpose; and that law provided what should be done with the results of that investigation. It provided that when the Commissioner of Corporations had made the investigation he should report the data in his hands to the President, and the President should determine what should be made public.

Gentlemen all know that in making these investigations it often becomes necessary to obtain confidential information. The Bureau of the Census constantly collects information on the special statement that the specific information will not be made public and shall be used only in the form of tabulation and in the form of results. I now yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BURLESON. I grant that what the gentleman says would be true if the investigation was ordered by the executive department, but this investigation was directed to be made by the House. And the Congress, as I understand it, could have directed the Secretary of Agriculture, or any other departmental or bureau officer, to make this investigation had it seen proper.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken. This investigation is not made by order of Congress. This investigation was made under a simple resolution of the House of Representatives, not a joint resolution of both Houses. This body can not direct a Department of the Government to expend money; and the gentleman from the great Committee on Appropriations would be one of the first to say that the House of itself, as one branch of the legislative body, can not direct the expenditure of large sums of money for investigations or otherwise.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. This resolution does not direct the Department to send the information. It requests it to do so. And I should say that that might put it in the discretion of the Department to send it or not. There is no attempt to make it mandatory.

Mr. MANN. In that respect, of course, the usage has been to request the President and direct a Department to reply to an inquiry. But both mean the same thing. I do not think there is any difference.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit this suggestion? I know I have seen cases in both Houses where they have asked the officers of the Department to do this or do that, but the ordinary form of the request is "if not incompatible with the public service."

Mr. MANN. That is the ordinary way of addressing the President, but when a Department is addressed the Department is directed. However, that is neither here nor there. Here is the situation: These gentlemen state that they have been endeavoring to obtain this information. No one knows why they have not received it. Is it to be presumed by this body, by this side of the House especially, that this report, which has been turned over by the Department of Commerce and Labor to the President for his approval and for his judgment, under the law, he is going improperly and unjustly to withhold the data in the case? I think it is safe to assume that the President, as soon as he has had an opportunity to examine this matter, will give to the Congress and to the public so much of the information as ought to be made public in conformity with the provisions under which it was obtained. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BURLESON. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has eight minutes remaining.

Mr. BURLESON. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I can not accede to the proposition of my friend, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that the Department of Commerce and Labor, or any Department of this Government, which has, under direction of the House or either branch of Congress, made an investigation and has obtained the information which Congress deemed necessary and proper to have procured, can withhold it; and that neither House can secure it unless it suits the will or pleasure of the head of the Department who has secured such information. Nor can I consent that the President can withhold such information when either House of Congress shall demand or request it. Certainly not without giving some good reason for withholding it. This is important information which the cotton producers, and the cotton manufacturers as well, are entitled to have. Neither the President nor any head of a Department ought to be permitted to thwart the will of the House, which has ordered its procurement.

Now, it is true that in the establishment of the Bureau of Corporations it was provided that the President might determine what particular evidence should be made public; but even with that provision I apprehend that the President himself, when called on by Congress, or either branch of Congress, would not say that he declined to furnish to the House information that he had obtained under a law of Congress providing for the investigation.

Now, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, we have made great strides, and many of them, in recent years toward the accomplishment and perpetuation of Executive power and Federalism; but it does seem to me that it ill becomes a Member of this House to assert that even the President of the United States, without reason, can refuse to give to the House information that it is entitled to have, secured upon an investigation authorized by it, and for which the necessary funds have been appropriated by Congress. When we shall have reached the conclusion that not only the President, but that also the Secretary of Commerce and Labor or any other public official, can pursue the course that is justified here by the gentleman from Illinois in doing, then we will have reached the goal of Federalism and our independence as Representatives will have passed away. For one, I can not consent to such a proposition.

Mr. BURLESON. I yield one minute to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA].

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. Speaker, I presume that no harm can come from the passing of a resolution of this kind. As I understand it, the resolution calls for an examination to be made by the Bureau of Commerce and Labor, and I take it for granted that it is proper that this House should know something about what that report is. This report, as I understand it, affects the producing districts, whether cotton or grain or any other product of the soil. I can not concede that it is improper to ask that the report that has been made by the Department of Commerce and Labor be submitted to this House. I believe that this House is entitled to it, and I shall vote for the resolution.

Mr. BURLESON. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON].

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, coming from a cotton-growing State, I most respectfully ask the House to adopt this resolution calling for this information, which I think will be of great benefit to the cotton growers of our country. Certainly this House ought to be willing to do anything within its power to benefit the cotton growers of the United States. Cotton is the great staple that furnishes us the balance of trade and brings us our gold supply. Not only that, but it is so important to the manufacturing interests of our country that many of the towns of New England would be without industrial employment for their population if it were not for the cotton spinning and weaving industry.

Of course, we all concede the importance of this resolution. What objection can there be to having it ascertained and reported to this House whether or not the fluctuations in the price of cotton have resulted in whole or in part from the character of contracts and deliveries thereon made on the cotton exchanges dealing in futures, or as the result of any combination or conspiracy which interferes with or hinders commerce amongst the several States or Territories or with foreign countries. That is substantially the language of the resolution.

The resolution calls for information which would enlighten us as to the question how far these cotton exchanges go toward affecting the price of this great staple. It would also give us information, if there be any, on that subject as to illegal combinations in restraint of trade which affect the price of cotton injuriously and cause violent fluctuations. Perhaps this resolution may be the means of ascertaining why cotton, which was worth, in the interior, in the early part of the current cotton year 13½ cents, was worth, according to the New York Cotton Exchange quotations yesterday, about 8½ cents, while spots, according to the price quoted by the same exchange, were worth 9½ cents per pound.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has ten minutes.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] five minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, it seems that about a year ago a resolution was passed by the House directing the Department under the law which created the Bureau of Commerce and Labor to make this investigation. Of course with that direction, the law having provided for it, the investigation was authorized and legalized. It would seem that the Department has been engaged in that investigation. From the nature and difficulties of the subject to be investigated, such an investigation of course, to be thorough, would require time. Whether the Department has taken more time than necessary I am not here to state, but it would seem to me that only a reasonable time has been taken to make this investigation.

The law also says that the result of that investigation shall be sent to the Executive, and it is for the Executive to say how much of the result of the investigation shall be given out, and this was a very proper provision of the law, because it facilitated the investigation of the subject by the Department of Labor. They could get more information from the people who had it if it was known that the information would be regarded as confidential in a certain way. Whatever may be the truth of the rumors that have come to the ears of the gentleman from Texas, it would seem that the Department and the Executive had followed the law and acted in a proper manner and paid proper heed to the resolution passed by the House of Representatives.

I was unwilling, however, to let this resolution go to a vote unless it could be thoroughly understood on the part of this side of the House that a vote for the resolution was not a vote indorsing the fiery speech of my gentle friend from Texas in behalf of the resolution, when he attacks both the Department and the Chief Executive for their action in this matter on the rumors or information which he had. I shall very cheerfully vote for this resolution because I think that it is the right of the House to ask the Department for the information. It is in the form of a request, being directed to the Department. We might direct the Department, but if for any reason the President thought it was not compatible with the interest of the public to give the information to Congress, he could properly direct the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to withhold it, and it would be a full reply to the resolution.

But the resolution is sent to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor without direction and only as a request. If we sent it to the President of the United States, then there would be coupled with the request, as is uniformly the practice, "if it is compatible with the public interest," or if he deems it so. But it is not necessary in this resolution. I think the resolution is a proper one and ought to pass, notwithstanding the speech made by the gentleman from Texas in its favor. [Laughter and applause.] Therefore I shall vote for the resolution.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have five minutes remaining.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has six minutes.

Mr. MANN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] when he takes the floor, and five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether this investigation has been completed. I have heard it whispered that that part of the investigation desired by the gentleman from Texas is practically complete. When the resolution calling for the investigation was passed by the House it was stated and understood that not only would the character of the contracts upon the various cotton exchanges be inquired into, but the action of the cotton growers' associations throughout the country, as well as the spinners' associations, would also be investigated.

I have in my possession a statement made by the commissioner of agriculture of the State of Texas within the past month or six weeks. It confirms the statement made by me when the original resolution was under discussion. I stated then that the cotton growers were engaged in what might just as well be termed "a conspiracy" as the actions of other persons dealing in cotton.

I stated that it was uniform in the South to have, if possible, harmonious action on the part of the cotton growers to prevent large acreage being planted with cotton. In the statement contained in the speech of the commissioner of agriculture of the State of Texas within the past six weeks it appears that there already are in sight 1,000,000 more bales of cotton than there would be any demand for within the coming year and that if the people of the State did not restrict the area to be planted, if they did not let the land lie fallow, then the price of cotton would be depressed. More than that, within the past two or three weeks Mr. Harvey Jordon, the president of some Southern cotton association, issued a very pathetic appeal to the cotton planters asking them not to increase the area to be planted. I have repeatedly stated, Mr. Speaker, that I am in favor of the "square deal." If the cotton exchanges are to be investigated because by reason of some of their actions they have been interfering with the price of cotton, why should not also the cotton planters' associations and the cotton spinners' associations, which are also endeavoring to interfere with the price of cotton?

I assume that the men who sell cotton desire to have the price as high as possible, while the men who buy cotton desire that the price shall be as low as possible. I represent the men who buy cotton, the men who contribute to the wealth and prosperity of the constituents of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] by sending their money to buy the product of his constituents. I am interested in having my people protected. He is interested in taking from them as much as possible—more, if possible, than they should pay for the products of his people. The gentleman from Texas, through his influence with this Administration, which I am compelled to admit has been much greater than has been assumed, has been able, I am informed, to have this investigation restricted to the good people who live in my district and the districts of my colleagues and to let go uninvestigated those men in his district who are attempting to force up the price of cotton and, necessarily, the price of cotton goods to the poor people of the North.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, the trouble with the gentleman from New York is that he is mistaken in his premise. He does not represent the people who buy cotton. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING] represents people who actually buy cotton. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] represents people who manipulate the price of cotton, and the real truth is that when the producers have grown the cotton and put it upon the market these exchange people represented by the gentleman from Greater New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], manipulate prices, so as to depress the price of the farmers' cotton and, after wresting it from their control, then afterwards, when the spinners, who consume cotton, want it, by manipulation they inflate prices and extort from these spinners—the consumer—from $30 to $40 a bale more than was paid to the producer. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BURLESON. I can not yield. I regret that my time is so limited I can not yield. My friend from New York has referred to a statement recently made by the commissioner of agriculture of my State wherein he urged the planter to limit the acreage planted. He does not seem to understand that the suggestion made by the commissioner of agriculture was that the farmer, if possible, should protect himself against the unholy combinations that have been made in the city of New York by those who control and manage this exchange to depress the product of their labor. [Applause.] The same thing is true of wheat as well, as the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] says.

Now, Mr. Speaker, a word with reference to the contention of my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. I concede that if this investigation had been made by direction of Executive authority, he would be right in his conclusions, but the difficulty here is that this investigation was not directed by the executive department. If it had been, then I grant you the President might withhold the result of the investigation, or any part thereof, if he saw fit to do so. But this particular investigation was directed by the House. If the Department officials had seen fit, when the resolution was adopted and transmitted to them, to have then said "You can not compel us, under the law, to make this investigation," this possibly they could have done, but having concluded the investigation under this resolution directing them to make it, these officials can not now withhold this report, or any part of it, under this law that has been cited by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DRISCOLL. To whom was the promise made to which the gentleman has referred?

Mr. BURLESON. It was made to me, for one. It was also made to a number of others, I will state to the gentleman; but I do not care to give the details of efforts which have been made to secure the report. I have felt that the House was entitled to know the reasons that prompted me to introduce this resolution, and that was the reason I made the statement that gave offense—well, not offense, but to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] took exception.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the resolution.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, pending that, I move that the House do take a recess until 11.30 o'clock to-morrow morning.

TRANSFER OF LAND AT PEKING, CHINA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pending that, if there be no objection, the Chair lays before the House the following message from the President of the United States.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of the Congress a communication from the Secretary of State, submitting a draft of a bill providing for the transfer to the Bank of Indo-China of a certain lot of land located at Peking, China, and now the property of the United States, said transfer being in consideration of the transfer to the United States by the Bank of Indo-China of three lots of land located in the said city.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 24, 1908.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The message will be referred under the rules to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed.

RESIGNATION FROM COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair also lays before the House the following.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 24, 1908.

Hon. JOS. G. CANNON,
Speaker House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I hereby tender my resignation as a member of the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, to take effect forthwith.

JOHN H. ROTHERMEL,
Thirteenth District, Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, Mr. ROTHERMEL will be released from further service on the committee. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to take a recess.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 129, nays 82, answered "present" 11, not voting 165, as follows:

So the motion to take a recess was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

For the balance of day:

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER with Mr. GLASS.

Mr. LILLEY with Mr. TALBOTT.

Until further notice:

Mr. DENBY with Mr. ALEXANDER of Missouri.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut with Mr. BRODHEAD.

Mr. KEIFER with Mr. BURGESS.

Mr. KNOPF with Mr. DAVENPORT.

Mr. LONGWORTH with Mr. CRAWFORD.

Mr. MCKINLEY of Illinois with Mr. HEFLIN.

Mr. NELSON with Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi.

Mr. WALDO with Mr. LLOYD.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.), the House took a recess until to-morrow at 11.30 a. m.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. HACKNEY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 208) for the survey and allotment of lands now embraced within the limits of the Fort Peck Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, and the sale and disposal of all the surplus lands after allotment, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 1507), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. ALEXANDER of New York, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 17993) to amend section 86 of an act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1508), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. McGUIRE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 19163) to grant certain lands to the State of Oklahoma, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1509), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. YOUNG, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 20656) appropriating $3,500 and providing for the laying of sidewalks and the placing of curb and gutters around certain portions of the national cemetery in the city of Fort Smith, Ark., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1510), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HAY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the resolution of the House (H. C. Res. 10) directing the Secretary of War to cause to be made a survey and map of the lines of investment and defense around Petersburg, Va., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1511), which said resolution and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. CARY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 18345) to fix the price of gas in the District of Columbia, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 1512), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. MONDELL, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 6155) to provide for an enlarged homestead, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 1513), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. JENKINS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the resolution of the House (H. Res. 365) relative to the constitutionality of H. R. 10456 and H. employment of additional clerks for the taking of the Thirteenth and subsequent censuses, which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of sundry citizens of Monson, Mass., and a petition of sundry citizens of Boston, Mass., praying for the adoption of certain amendments to the so-called "Sherman antitrust law" relating to labor organizations, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CURTIS presented a petition of the Zodiac Club, of Lawrence, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for competitive examinations for clerks employed in the taking of the Thirteenth and subsequent censuses, which was referred to the Committee on the Census.

He also presented petitions of sundry labor organizations of Fort Scott, Parsons, Pittsburg, and Kansas City, all in the State of Kansas, praying for the adoption of certain amendments to the so-called "Sherman antitrust law" relating to labor organizations, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DILLINGHAM presented a petition of sundry citizens of Berlin, Vt., and a petition of sundry citizens of Hartland and Taftsville, Vt., praying for the passage of the so-called "parcels-post bill," which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. STEWART presented a petition of Local Union No. 28, Brotherhood of Painters, Decorators, and Paperhangers of America, of Rutland, Vt., praying for the adoption of certain amendments to the so-called "Sherman antitrust law" relating to labor organizations, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BULKELEY presented a petition of Tunxis Grange, No. 13, Patrons of Husbandry, of Bloomfield, Conn., praying for the passage of the so-called "rural parcels-post bill," which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a memorial of Third Division, Ancient Order of Hibernians, of Hartford, Conn., remonstrating against the ratification of the treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BRANDEGEE presented a memorial of Third Division, Ancient Order of Hibernians, of Hartford, Conn., remonstrating against the ratification of the treaty of arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the City Club of Chicago, Ill., and a petition of the Trades League of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation to establish a national forest reserve in the Southern Appalachian and White Mountains, which were ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. KNOX, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6074) to provide for holding terms of the United States circuit and district courts at Springfield, Mass., reported it without amendment.

Mr. BURROWS, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 130) to constitute Eastport, Idaho, in the customs collection district of Montana and Idaho, a subport of entry and delivery, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce, which was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (S. 6826) to correct the military record of Albert S. Austin, which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KNOX introduced a bill (S. 6827) granting an increase of pension to Christian Paul, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM introduced the following bills, which were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 6828) granting an increase of pension to Charles A. Wyeth;

A bill (S. 6829) granting an increase of pension to Willard Morris (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 6830) granting an increase of pension to Theodore D. Mather (with accompanying papers).

Mr. GORE introduced a bill (S. 6831) providing for the platting and selling of that part of the southwest quarter and the west half of the southeast quarter of section 14 in township 7 north, range 10 west of Indian meridian, lying south of the right of way of the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railway Company, situated in the county of Caddo, Okla., for townsite purposes, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6832) providing for the holding of the United States district courts at Hugo, Okla., which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6833) granting an honorable discharge of George Vandegriff, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. WARREN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $2,446.34 to pay Howard B. Carpenter the balance due him for survey of boundary line between the States of Idaho and Montana, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DIXON submitted an amendment providing that the unexpended balance of appropriation in pursuance of treaty stipulations for subsistence and civilization of the Northern Cheyenne and Arapahoes for the year 1907 be appropriated and made available for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1908, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was ordered to be printed and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

AMENDMENT TO OMNIBUS PUBLIC BUILDINGS BILL.

Mr. BROWN submitted an amendment proposing that the limit of cost of the United States post-office and site at Kearney, Nebr., be increased from $85,000 to $110,000, intended to be proposed by him to the omnibus public buildings bill, which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. WETMORE submitted two amendments intended to be proposed by him to House bill 15372, known as the "omnibus claims bill," which were ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 15372, known as the "omnibus claims bill," which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. WARREN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 15372, known as the "omnibus claims bill," which was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM BOLDENWECK.

Mr. CULLOM. I should like to call up the bill (S. 890) for the relief of William Boldenweck, assistant treasurer of the United States at Chicago.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. The naval appropriation bill has been continued so long that it is essential that it should be passed to-day. I must object after this to any time being taken for the consideration of bills.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope this bill will take but a few moments.

Mr. HALE. If it gives rise to any debate, of course I must object.

Mr. CULLOM. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It authorizes the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, in settling the accounts of William Boldenweck, assistant treasurer of the United States at Chicago, to pass to the credit of said Boldenweck the sum of $173,000, being the sum which was stolen from the subtreasury at Chicago during the year 1907.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the naval appropriation bill be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 20471) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES]. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 85, line 17, before the words "first-class battle ships," strike out "two" and insert "four."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it. The noes have it, and the amendment is disagreed to.

Mr. HALE. I would be very glad to have the bill disposed of in that way, but two or three Senators——

Mr. PILES. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will wait a moment, if no Senator desires further to debate the bill, I am entirely willing and ready for a vote, and will call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, my purpose in rising is to present an amendment if there is no amendment pending.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. FRYE. There is one pending.

Mr. CULBERSON. I inquired if there was an amendment pending.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is no amendment pending.

Mr. HALE. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CULBERSON. I offer the following as an additional section.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CULBERSON. Let the amendment proposed by me be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following paragraph:

That none of the amounts herein appropriated for construction shall be expended where any laborer or mechanic doing any part of the work contemplated by the contract, in the employ of the contractor or any subcontractor contracting for any part of said work contemplated, shall be required or permitted to work more than eight hours in any one calendar day upon such work except upon permission granted by the Secretary of the Navy during time of war or a time where war is imminent, or where any great national emergency exists: And provided further, That the contractor contracting with the United States shall, in the event of the violation of said covenant as to hours of labor, forfeit to the United States the sum of $5 for each laborer or mechanic for every calendar day for which he shall have been required or permitted to labor more than eight hours upon the work under such contract.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, I understand that the amendment I proposed to the pending bill was voted upon. I had gone out of the Chamber for a few moments to meet a gentleman from my State. My understanding was that several Senators desired to address the Senate and that the matter was to be further considered. I should like to have the amendment reconsidered and brought again before the Senate. If not, I reserve the right to renew my amendment in the Senate.

Mr. HALE. That right, undoubtedly, the Senator will have.

Mr. PILES. I do not think the amendment ought to be disposed of in the way it was. I do not think an amendment of this character and importance ought to be taken up and passed upon suddenly when the Senator who offered it had been called out of the Chamber. For that reason I hope the Senator from Maine will consent to a reconsideration of the question and let us have a vote upon it.

Mr. HALE. I did not push the vote. The Chair put the question to a vote, as was proper. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] was to speak first to-day and was present, and he stated that in order to have a vote, he did not care to go on, and the Chair put the vote, as was natural. There has been no attempt on anybody's part to foreclose the amendment or debate upon it. All the rights that the Senator from Washington or any Senator has will be entirely preserved in the Senate. There will be no attempt in this case to prevent a square stand-up vote of the Senate finally on the proposition. The Senator will get all his rights. I did not push the matter.

Mr. PILES. I will ask the Senator if he does not think, then, that under all the circumstances the vote ought to be reconsidered and the amendment taken up in the usual way in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. HALE. If the Senator thinks that that is preferable, I will not object. Either way would take the same length of time.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It can be offered in the Senate.

Mr. HALE. As the Senator from Indiana says, it can be offered in the Senate.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish to understand the parliamentary condition as clearly as possible. I am not nearly so well versed in parliamentary procedure as the Senator from Maine, but I understand that when the bill goes out of Committee of the Whole and is in the Senate it is still open to amendment.

Mr. HALE. It is open to amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. In every part.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And the amendment of the Senator from Washington can be offered in the Senate as though it never had been offered before.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And then the bill with the amendment is still open to debate in the Senate as much as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HALE. As to that or any other amendment.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Indiana is clearly right in his statement.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I merely want it so that we may understand it. I was not sure myself. Of course the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Rhode Island are masters of parliamentary procedure. So we do understand that when the bill comes out of Committee of the Whole into the Senate the rights of the Senator from Washington are not impaired, and he will then have the right to offer his amendment again in the Senate just as fully as in Committee of the Whole and to debate it to that extent.

Mr. HALE. Then, on the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana, I will ask that we shall go on with the bill.

Mr. PILES. I prefer that the amendment shall now be reconsidered and that we shall proceed with it in the manner in which we were proceeding upon it originally. The RECORD now shows that the amendment was defeated, and I think it would be better under all the circumstances to have the amendment proceed on the same line we were proceeding with it before the vote was taken upon the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington move a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment was rejected?

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. PILES. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. The Senator need not move to reconsider it. If the Senator is not content with the suggestion made by the Senator from Indiana, I am entirely willing that by unanimous consent the vote shall be regarded as reconsidered and the amendment be before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment was rejected? The Chair hears none. The amendment is before the Senate, and the question is upon agreeing to the same.

Mr. TELLER. I rose to make that suggestion. That was the only purpose I had in rising, and it is now disposed of. I suppose the debate will go on as if the vote had not been taken.

Mr. HALE. Yes; and in the meantime the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas is pending.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the one offered by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. CULBERSON. I withdraw the amendment proposed by myself until the other is disposed of.

Mr. HALE. That is better.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the one offered by the Senator from Washington. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the pending proposition is to authorize four ships of a certain type instead of two, as suggested by the Committee on Naval Affairs in a bill making appropriations for the extension and the support of the Navy for the coming fiscal year. The bill carries aggregate appropriations in excess of $123,000,000. The extraordinary contention of the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] that this amendment is one of great national and international importance, and that the governments and cabinets of the world are waiting breathlessly upon the decision of the Senate upon it, if it were not for certain serious aspects of the case, would be simply ludicrous.

If the Senator from Indiana had said to the Senate that the question whether the recommendations of the British Admiralty as to whether they should build one ship or three ships of the Dreadnought type was a question which involved the peace of the world, one which involved the honor and the supremacy of Great Britain, that statement would have been considered absurd. Is there anything about the condition of the United States that takes away the element of absurdity from the proposition made by the Senator from Indiana? I think not.

I have said that there were certain very serious aspects to this case. I regret exceedingly the tone of the remarks of the Senator from Washington and the Senator from Indiana upon the floor on yesterday. I suggest to Senators that a self-respecting nation, jealous of its rights and its powers and feeling its responsibilities as a member of the great family of nations, would look with more disfavor upon insinuations and innuendoes made upon the floor of the American Senate by persons claiming to have the authority of the President of the United States than they would upon open threats or open manifestations of hostility.

The suggestions that there are nations professing friendly relations with the United States that have designs not to be spoken of above a whisper that would be detrimental to the interests of the United States, should certainly not be stated here unless known to be true. These insinuations should not in any event affect our vote on the pending amendment.

Does any Senator suppose that our friendly or unfriendly relations with other countries is to be determined by the fact that we have thirty-three battle ships instead of thirty-one? If there is any nation that has designs upon us, are they likely to yield their purposes if we have thirty-three battle ships instead of thirty-one? Does any Senator have any such idea?

Mr. President, in my opinion neither the Senator from Indiana nor the Senator from Washington had any authority to speak for the President of the United States in this regard, and when the Senator from Indiana said in his place in the Senate that if this amendment was to be considered in executive session it would receive the unanimous vote of the Senate——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH (continuing). Plainly stating as plain as language could, that there are in existence facts known to him and perhaps known to others that would lead the Senate, if they were voting free and with a knowledge of the facts, to an opposite conclusion——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator, of course, does not want to misquote me nor any man, nor to do any man an injustice.

Mr. ALDRICH. No; certainly not.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I have not my remarks here, and I have not had time to go over them. Otherwise they would have appeared in the RECORD. I have sent for them and will have them in a moment.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator will pardon me just a moment. Neither the Senator from Washington nor myself said to the Senate that we spoke on the authority of the President any more than any other Senator might. I made distinct reference only to his message, and I said—and I have my remarks downstairs and will get them—that what he might have in his mind no man knew.

As to the executive session, the Senator is again wrong. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] put to me the question, naming a certain foreign friendly power, whether I thought there was any similarity in the situation between us and that specific power and the situation that existed between that power and another friendly power prior to a recent war. I responded—and the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], sitting in his seat in front of me, said from his chair "that is right"—that it was not proper to discuss a possible conflict, in my judgment, upon the floor of the Senate in open, or even hardly in executive, session when naming particular powers. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] instantly recognized that, and said he thought that it was true, and withdrew his question.

Mr. President, I merely make this interruption so that the Senator may not go on upon a misapprehension. I did very carefully and definitely state, and it will be found in my remarks, the exact limitations to which I thought we might go in debate upon that question.

While I am on my feet I will say that I had and I shall later on in the debate produce speeches by a very eminent Senator——

Mr. ALDRICH. That is hardly an answer.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; it is merely a correction; but if the Senator does not want me to make the statement I shall not make it.

Mr. ALDRICH. But I do not like to have you make too many speeches in my time.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Of course I will not say more than I think the exigencies call for. I have and, if necessary, I shall produce speeches made heretofore by an eminent Senator, a veteran Senator, where the limitations of debate upon such a question as this that I yesterday marked out were not at all followed, but were exceeded, and where trouble between this and another friendly power was set forth in such vigorous terms that it got the attention of the entire country. I suppose the older Senators here will remember that debate. Also I shall produce the speeches of other very distinguished Senators of like character. By them I shall show that my remarks yesterday were moderate and mild compared with theirs on former occasions.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I only wish to have the Senator yield that I may contribute my clear recollection. The Senator from Indiana has not stated all that was said. When reference was made to the discussion in executive session, and when it was said that only there and in an extreme case should it be discussed, the Senator from Indiana did say that if this matter could be discussed in executive session there would be no vote against four ships.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HALE. My recollection is——

Mr. ALDRICH. That was my statement of what the Senator from Indiana said.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator from Rhode Island permit me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield further to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator desires to withdraw the statement or explain it, I am quite willing to yield.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I have my speech, which when published will stand the test. The Senator from Maine must do me the justice to say——

Mr. ALDRICH. I am talking about the speech as made and not as it will appear in the RECORD.

Mr. HALE. Other Senators heard all this.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Very well; all right. The speech will appear just as it was made. But I have no objection to anything I said if other Senators do. It was not said in executive session. My recollection of what I said in answer to the Senator from Maine is that I said nobody knew what information the Chief Executive, the Commander in Chief of the Navy, has.

Mr. ALDRICH. The statement was not in that connection.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes, in that connection; and I said that doubtless if we could discuss this matter fully there would not be many votes against it. Executive session was not mentioned.

Mr. ALDRICH. My recollection is perfectly plain, and I am willing to leave it to the recollection of Senators who heard the Senator from Indiana. The impression made upon me, and I assume it is the impression made upon every Senator, was that there were facts in this case known to the Senator from Indiana that would have changed the result if they were known publicly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I dislike to interrupt the Senator, but what I did say was that no man knew what facts the President had.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is not what I am talking about. That is not the statement I am discussing. The impression made upon my mind, and, I think, the impression made generally, was that there were facts in existence in this case that, if they were known to the Senate generally, would change the result of this vote. I venture to deny for the President of the United States and for the Administration and for the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations, who, I hope, will be heard from in this connection, that there are any facts with reference to our relations with any friendly power that if they became known would affect the question now pending before the Senate.

It is undoubtedly true that the President of the United States is in favor of four battle ships; he has made his position known to the Senate and to Senators; but that he is in favor of this change for any such considerations as those urged by the Senator from Indiana on yesterday I deny. Now, if there are any such facts within the knowledge of the Senator from Indiana, he is bound to say so to the Senate and to the country. I think there are none.

Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana says that if we vote for four battle ships peace is secured, and that everything is to be harmonious and lovely in the future; but that if we vote for only two battle ships that there is great danger of war, and that every evil to which mankind is liable is certain to result if the Senate declines to follow his judgment and his opinion.

The Senator from Indiana says that we should not have had the Spanish war if we had had two more battle ships in 1898. Everyone who knows anything of the circumstances under which that war was brought about and the attitude which Spain was obliged to take by reason of conditions in her own country and not here, realizes that statement is very far from the facts. If we had had forty battle ships at that time Spain would have been obliged to go to war to preserve her Government at home, if for no other reason.

The Senator from Indiana said that Great Britain owes her exemption from war to her great navy, and that she could not have carried on the Boer war successfully—perhaps the Senator should like to interrupt me about that—unless she had a great navy. Is there anything in the facts to justify that statement? I think not. The Boer war did not grow out of the fact that Great Britain had a navy. It was carried on in spite of the fact that Great Britain had a navy. It was not put down by the use of the navy. The navy of Great Britain had no more to do with it than the Navy of the United States, either in its inception or in its conclusion.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the American mules, which the British succeeded in getting in the Boer country, enabled them to succeed in that war.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think that that fact had more to do with it than the navy of Great Britain.

The Senator from Washington and the Senator from Indiana assume that there is something almost sacred about the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington for four ships. As I have said, why four ships and not five; why not six, or seven, or ten? If there is some great war cloud hanging over this country, if the Pacific Ocean is to be, as the Senator from Washington says, the storm center of a great conflict, why does the Senator from Washington show this modesty and forbearance with reference to the safety of his constituents?

Mr. PILES. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. ALDRICH. I do.

Mr. PILES. I wish to say to the Senator from Rhode Island that I did not speak with any authority of the President.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am glad to hear one disclaimer. We may have perhaps another disclaimer from the Senator from Indiana. I do not know whether he is going to make it later or not. I hope he is.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I dislike to interrupt the Senator any more, but I wish to answer him.

Mr. PILES. I read the portion of the President's special message to Congress which I thought was necessary for me to present in the course of the remarks I made. I have had no communication with the President on this subject, direct or indirect. I got my communication from him through his message.

I beg the Senator's pardon, but I made no statement yesterday that the Pacific Ocean was to be the storm center of any war or that we were to have any war.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. PILES. If the Senator will pardon me a moment——

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. PILES. What I said was that if we had a war, the Pacific Ocean would be the storm center of that war. That was my statement.

Mr. ALDRICH. If we should get into war with Germany, I suppose the Pacific Ocean would not be the storm center.

Mr. PILES. I maintain, and I think it must be apparent to all men who have thought of the situation, that if we do have a war, the next war we will have will be on the Pacific Ocean. I apprehend no war, but I wish to state, as I said yesterday, that in my judgment if we do have a war the Pacific Ocean will be the storm center of that war.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is what I am finding fault with, or trying to find fault with, in my feeble way. The Senator made a statement that the Pacific Ocean would be the storm center. I suggested then that that was only another way of saying that there is a possibility of war with Japan. There is no other power with which we could engage in war in which the Pacific Ocean could be made the storm center.

What I am objecting to as strongly as I can is the insinuations made by both Senators that there is some mysterious, baneful influence or disaster hanging over the people of the United States that should force us to favor four battle ships, and I was discussing the sacredness of this number. I should like to have some Senator tell me why thirty-three battle ships instead of thirty-one can be relied upon to preserve the peace of the world. Does any Senator here think that Great Britain, for instance, if we should have differences with her, would yield her convictions as to what her honor or her interest required because the United States had thirty-three battle ships instead of thirty-one?

If there is any danger of a conflict between the United States and any power, does any Senator suppose that that power, whether Japan or Great Britain, or any other country on the face of the globe, would change their convictions of duty to themselves and to their people simply because the United States has two more battle ships? The contention, Senators, is absolutely absurd.

The Senator from Indiana also proposes to try Senators as to their loyalty to the Navy and its traditions and its prowess upon the question whether they are going to vote in this body for four battle ships or for two. I will say to him and to the Senator from Washington that there were patriotic Senators who devoted their time and their energies successfully to the upbuilding and the preservation of the American Navy before the advent of the Senator from Indiana or the Senator from Washington. I have misread the history of my country——

Mr. PILES. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes, sir.

Mr. PILES. I should like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island if he heard me make any statement in my remarks which challenged the patriotism of any Senator on this floor——

Mr. ALDRICH. No; perhaps not——

Mr. PILES. Or that, by the greatest stretch of imagination, could be assumed——

Mr. ALDRICH. Perhaps not their patriotism, but their judgment. When the Senator said that we have a fleet composed largely of ships of an obsolete type, I think that was an intimation that the men who are controlling these matters, both in the Department and in Congress, had not kept abreast with the times, at least in providing for the construction of a Navy.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me a moment, the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. ALDRICH. Very well.

Mr. PILES. My statement was that there were eleven, as I understood, of the thirty-one battle ships that are of an obsolete type. I said nothing more and nothing less than that, and I meant not to impugn any Senator's motive or the motive of anyone else in not keeping our Navy up to the standard.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am not suggesting that the Senator from Washington or the Senator from Indiana impugned the motive of anybody. But if I heard the Senator from Indiana correctly or understood the force of his argument, it was that we had reached a crisis in national affairs, and that whether a Senator was loyal to the American Navy, whether he was loyal to the great principles of peace, whether he was loyal to a desire to promote the future welfare of his country was to depend upon whether he would vote for four battle ships. We were held up, as it were, and told that the President of the United States having asked for four battle ships, we could not refuse without ignoring the experience of the world, without turning our back upon the American Navy and putting the United States into a position where she would be defenseless in case of a war, which seemed to be impending somewhere in the universe.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not intend to interrupt the Senator any more than is absolutely necessary for the correctness of this debate, preferring to reserve such things as I have to state until afterwards. Not only was there no imputation of any Senator's patriotism, but I particularly said—I remember the statement, which I have since read, in my remarks made directly to the Senator from Rhode Island—that the Senator from Rhode Island was as patriotic as any Senator in this Chamber, and that every Senator in this Chamber was as patriotic as every other Senator in this Chamber. Those were the exact words addressed particularly to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Next, with reference to this being a crisis, having referred to the large number of incidents where war had come unexpectedly, I said it might be possible, in view of the past, that this will be a critical vote. Now, those were the statements really made.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think I have not misrepresented the Senator. Certainly I have not done so intentionally.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I know you have not, but I made that statement directly and emphatically and in plain words. So far from impugning anybody's patriotism, I stated positively that I asserted the equal patriotism of all, and especially that of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. It was possibly an impeachment of our intelligence, rather than our patriotism, that was intended to be conveyed.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I did not say anything about that, of course. We have different views.

Mr. ALDRICH. I understand the Senator from Indiana stated—I do not want to misquote him, and I do not think I do—that if we were not to have a navy which was adequate for the purposes of peace, any money taken for the support of the Navy was, I think he used the word "filched," from the people of the United States. Now, let us examine that question.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I want to say that I will not interrupt the Senator again, but I can not permit him now to go on making statements that he says I made, but which I did not make; and later I shall give precisely the statements that were made, as I have before me just exactly what I did say.

Mr. ALDRICH. I certainly heard the Senator make the statement on two different occasions, but I am entirely willing that the Senator shall modify it or explain it in any way he pleases——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; not at all. I stand on that particular statement precisely where I did stand, and I will repeat it when I come to reply to the Senator.

Mr. ALDRICH. It must be evident to the Senate that I am laboring under a great deal of difficulty in discussing this question with the Senator from Indiana in having to rely upon my recollection of what he said, though I think my recollection is perfectly clear.

But is it true that we must have a navy which is adequate or have no navy at all? Who is to decide the question of adequacy? We had in 1898 a new navy, a reconstructed navy. Now, does the Senator from Indiana mean to say that the Navy at that time was inadequate? Who is to determine the question as to the adequacy of the American Navy, except the representatives of the American people, taking into consideration all the circumstances and conditions which surround the country? Are we to have a navy as large as that of Great Britain? There is not a Senator who listens to me who does not know the conditions and circumstances under which the navy of Great Britain is maintained. Are we to go into competition with European nations, especially with Great Britain, as to the size of our Navy? Who is to determine this question? Is the Senator from Indiana to be the sole judge of the question of the adequacy of the Navy? I submit that it is the duty of the Congress of the United States to provide a navy which is adequate and efficient. I think they have done so. What addition shall be made in this bill to the naval programme is a question not of sentiment; it is a question not of peace; but it is a question of practical administration, taking into consideraton all the facts and circumstances that surround us.

The Senator from Indiana said yesterday that those of us who would not agree with him upon this proposition must disagree solely upon the ground that we did not think war was possible. Am I mistaken in that statement?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will say to the Senator that I have made up my mind not to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is all right. I am glad to have the Senator interrupt me.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But I have my remarks here, and I think I shall answer the Senator to his satisfaction. I hope so.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the Senator from Indiana said on three or four occasions that we could not resist the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES] except upon the theory that we thought war was impossible. Every man who listens to me knows that nothing is impossible in the scope of human existence. I say to the Senator from Indiana that in view of the circumstances and conditions in which the United States finds herself, when we consider that the finances of a country are the principal element to be considered, when we consider that there is not an European nation that could be advantaged by war with the United States or by permitting a war with the United States, I say—and I mean to give my words all the power which I can give them—that war between the United States and any other nation is improbable; and I believe there is no Senator present who does not in his heart of hearts agree with that statement.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I said that same thing three times during my remarks.

Mr. ALDRICH. Well, if that is true, why are the Senators who do not agree with the Senator from Indiana as to the precise number of battle ships to be appropriated or provided for in this bill held up as the enemies of peace, simply because they do not agree with the Senator upon a practical proposition?

Now, is it true that anywhere at any time, the size of a nation's navy has had anything to do with the question of a declaration of war? Can any Senator remember a case in the history of the world where that has been the element which has been decisive in the question of peace or war? I shall be glad if any Senator can cite an instance.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator repeat that query?

Mr. ALDRICH. I think there never was a time in the history of the world when any war has been decided with reference to the relative size of the navies of the countries involved.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am glad to hear that statement repeated the second time. I did not catch it the first time, because I thought that I gave——

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, we on this side of the Chamber can only hear one side of the controversy. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] is not heard on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I thought I gave at least two recent, definite, admitted, historical examples; and when I come to say what I have to say——

Mr. ALDRICH. What were they?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. When I come to say what I have to say, I shall repeat them and illustrate them.

Mr. ALDRICH. Can the Senator from Indiana not state in two words what they were?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes; perhaps not in two words, but in three or four words. I said that if Japan, at the close of the Chino-Japanese war, had had her present navy, she could not have been forced, and would not have been forced, to recede to China the Liaotung Peninsula. That is a fact admitted by all students and historians, and that recession was the sole cause of the war between Russia and Japan. Does the Senator from Rhode Island deny that?

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Indiana assumes two or three different things of which I have no knowledge and as to which I assume he has no definite information.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from Rhode Island assumes a good many things.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not like to assent to a conclusion until I know something about the premises.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am stating this as a fact, and the Senator asked me for an illustration.

I say, second, that I believe it is the consensus of students—I say this after having given some little attention to it—that again before the Russo-Japanese war broke out, if Russia had had a great up-to-date effective navy there is little doubt but that that controversy would have been settled by diplomacy. If there has been a student or writer who disagrees as to those recent historic significant examples, I do not know who he is, and I would be glad for the Senator from Rhode Island to point him out. There are two examples. I shall give more when I come to reply.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, both of the cases cited are based upon pure speculation. I said, and I repeat it, that I believe there is not a single example in modern times or in ancient times where the question of the size of a navy was the sole controlling element in a decision for peace. The Russo-Japanese war began, not because Japan had a larger or a more effective navy than Russia had, but because of underlying causes with which the Senator from Indiana is as familiar as I am. If I am not mistaken in my recollection, the Senator from Indiana, in a book which he wrote upon the subject of "The Russian Advance," thought that the Russian navy at that time was fully equal, if not superior, to the Japanese navy, and that this superiority or inferiority could not have had the least effect on the result.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. There again: The Senator has not done me the honor of reading that chapter in that book in which, in my feeble way, I discussed that question. I can remember only now that I said that, from an uninstructed observer's point of view, the Russian ships looked to be in much better condition than people supposed they were. Yesterday the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] said that I had predicted a certain thing, which was the precise reverse of what I actually did say.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator from Rhode Island will permit me——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Since the Senator's ample denial that his book showed, from his view, the superiority of Russia over Japan and the power of that great Empire to sweep Japan from the face of the earth, I have given myself the pleasure of going over the pages of the Senator's book, The Russian Advance; and the whole book, Mr. President, is devoted to the proposition that no nation could stand in the East before Russia; that anywhere and everywhere she would dominate and prevail, and would drive every nation from the Pacific. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALDRICH. That is my recollection of the book. [Laughter.]

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island will permit me to say that, in view of the interpretation of my poor literary effort made by the Senator from Maine, at this "late and appreciative day," to use the language of the Senator from Iowa on another occasion, I think I shall have to make, before the debate is over, profert of exactly what I did say myself on this particular subject.

Mr. HALE. Or make another book. [Laughter.]

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I would almost be tempted to do that.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I am only alluding to the statement of the Senator from Indiana in his book to refute the statement which he has made here as to what was the opinion at that time of the relative strength of these two navies, and that the war was not undertaken on either side simply because one side or the other had, as it believed, a preponderance of naval power. I may use it perhaps for another purpose——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes; I think I shall use it myself now——

Mr. ALDRICH (continuing). To say that possibly even the Senator from Indiana, whose scope of knowledge is certainly wide, once in a while may be mistaken when he undertakes to spread his powers of observations over the entire world. The power to do that is given to but few of us. The Senator from Indiana in this case, as perhaps in no other, was certainly mistaken.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I assume that I certainly have the common human failings. Yet every prediction made in my book came true. All of us make more mistakes than otherwise, no doubt; that is merely human; but, as a matter of fact, the chief thing in this book, to which I want to call the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from Maine at this particular juncture, is to the other statement. I will repeat in exact words what I said myself, that the original articles—five years before that war—stated the elements of the situation and why war was inevitable; but so greatly did the Senator from Maine—whose judgment I then and now esteem—so weightily did he differ from me that his judgment caused me to modify that statement, the opinion being held also by the Senator from Rhode Island at that time that war was absolutely impossible for financial, as well as for other reasons; yet within three months from the time that was done war was raging. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana has convinced me that he has more capacity as a prophet than he has as a historian or a statistician. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator from Rhode Island will permit me the observation, I should like to suggest that if some of the critics of the Senator from Indiana had reduced their own opinions to writing within the last few years they might find them quite as contradictory as the Senator from Rhode Island says that the Senator from Indiana has found his.

Mr. ALDRICH. Most of us are too prudent to do that. [Laughter.] But to get to the practical question which is before the Senate, because, if I am not mistaken, the Senate is not to determine this question upon pyrotechnics or upon the assumption that the President of the United States and the American Government are afraid to do what is right and just in their relations with the other nations of the world and that it is necessary for them to build four more battle ships to create a feeling of fear on the part of those countries, which in some way are contemplating hostile relations with us. Is there a Senator present who does not believe, if there is to be a war with anybody, that the entire resources of this country, vast and infinite as they are, will be immediately placed at the disposal of the Chief Executive as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him—not for a question, but for a very brief interruption——

Mr. ALDRICH. Very well.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is this: Of course every man of every party and of every faith in time of hostilities would put not only the resources of the country but his life at the service of the nation and the flag.

Mr. ALDRICH. I intended to include that, of course, in my statement.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator would except that?

Mr. ALDRICH. No, I meant to include it. I consider the resources of the American nation are, first, in the manhood and character of its people.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The point that I wish to make is that the resources of a people not utilized for the purpose of preventing war until war comes are infinitely less useful than when used in advance. For example, we can not, after hostilities break out, build a ship. The Senator will concede that. If we are unprepared——

Mr. ALDRICH. We might buy them if we could not build them, which I do not concede.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. You mean we could buy them during the war?

Mr. ALDRICH. We bought two in the Spanish-American war, and Great Britain bought a number during the Boer war.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will ask the Senator whether it is not true that in time of war fighting ships and all munitions of war are not contraband?

Mr. ALDRICH. Who is to determine that question? If we are in war, who pays attention to what is contraband?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. International law—that pays attention to what is contraband. International law! The Senator does not mean to say that he proposes not to prepare for war and then to escape the unpreparedness by violating international law?

Mr. ALDRICH. I will say that my understanding is we bought ships of exactly that kind during the Spanish-American war.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am glad that the Senator gave that illustration. We paid for those ships many times what they were worth and what they could have been obtained for before the war broke out. Does the Senator deny that? No! for the whole world knows it.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is a different question.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly, it is a different question. That is the point—it is a different question! Now, Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH. I think I will have to go on. I think I will have to ask the Senator not to interrupt me further.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Very well; it was perfectly proper for me to interrupt, and I will be very glad to defer this; but at the time of our unpreparedness——

Mr. ALDRICH. There must be a limit upon interruption.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. At the time, I will say, both of the civil war and the Spanish war it cost us hundreds of millions of dollars in money and thousands of lives just because we were unprepared. It does not answer that statement to say the resources of this nation are open both as to its money and its manhood when war comes.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator is confirming exactly what I am trying to impress upon the Senate—confirming it in the strongest possible way—that is, whether we are in favor of having an adequate navy and of appropriating the resources of the United States to be properly used, and that is the question which the Senator from Indiana proposes to determine for us.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I have a right, have I not, Mr. President, to give my views and arguments?

Mr. ALDRICH. I beg the Senator's pardon. The Senator said in effect to us yesterday, if you do not vote for four battle ships—as I say, going back to the sacredness of this number—then you are not in favor of peace; then you are not in favor of using the resources of the nation as the President thinks they ought to be used. I am here as a Senator representing a State, as the Senator from Indiana is, and I do not propose to delegate to either that Senator or to any other man the right to use my judgment as to how the resources of the United States shall be used, having in mind all the time my duty as a Senator of the United States and my duty as a patriotic citizen of the United States.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH. And I do not propose to permit the Senator from Indiana or any other Senator to say to me, "If you do not vote for four battle ships instead of two you are false to the traditions of this country and to its highest interests." I say there is no such question involved here. It is a pure, practical question of administration under the conditions and circumstances which surround us. I do not criticise the President of the United States for believing in four battle ships. That is his right. It is his right and his duty, if he so believes, to send to this Congress messages to that effect. I do not object to his sending for Senators and trying to impress upon them that they ought to vote in accordance with his wishes and his opinions; I have no fault to find with that, but I do find fault with the Senator from Indiana, who undertakes, in a speech, to say to us, as I understand him, "The President of the United States says this, therefore you must do it, and if you do not do it you are neglecting your patriotic duty as a member of the Senate."

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, the Senator must permit me——

Mr. ALDRICH. I may have been mistaken in my construction of the Senator's speech, but I do not think I was.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator says that he will not delegate his right to think and vote to anybody. Does the Senator expect, on the contrary, that other Senators, representing States and having the same patriotic devotion to their duty that I yesterday ascribed to the Senator from Rhode Island, should delegate their duties and their votes and their arguments to anybody else?

Mr. ALDRICH. Not in the slightest degree. I am not finding fault at all with the opinions or the judgment of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Has not any Senator the right to present to the Senate his views as well as the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. ALDRICH. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I call the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island to the fact that I began my few remarks yesterday with the statement that on the day before the Senator from Maine—and it will be found in the RECORD—had said that the mind of the Senate was ALREADY MADE UP, without any discussion.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not find fault with the judgment of the Senator from Indiana at all. He has a perfect right to his own judgment and his own opinions, and I hope he controls his own vote.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator knows I do—nobody knows it better than he. And I hope that every Senator on this floor does. The only thing that has appeared in this debate that might create any impeachment of that was the statement—which I said I was satisfied the Senator from Maine did not mean in that sense—that the mind of the Senate upon this critical question WAS MADE UP BEFORE any debate or discussion had occurred.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the Senator is entitled to his opinion, of course. The President of the United States is entitled to his opinion.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is right.

Mr. ALDRICH. What I have been trying to do—and I have failed in everything I have attempted, unless I have succeeded in doing it—was to convince the Senate that this was not a question affecting the peace and war of the people of the United States, or of any other country in the world; I objected to the Senator from Indiana putting it in that form, and I objected to the insinuation which permeated his speech and the speech of the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES], though not to the same extent, that there was some grave, impending difficulty, and that if the President of the United States should tell other Senators what he had told them, there would be a different vote upon this proposition.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, that statement will not——

Mr. ALDRICH. I object to arguments and statements of this character. I say, so far as the Senator from Indiana ventured to express the opinions of the President or the Administration, that he did it without any authority whatever.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is very distasteful to me to be compelled constantly to call the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island to the fact that statements attributed to me were not made, and I resolved not to do it any more; but he will not find such a statement as he just now attributes to me in this RECORD. Furthermore, I have——

Mr. ALDRICH. I am not talking about the RECORD.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Furthermore, I have been nine years in this Senate and I have never assumed to speak for anybody except myself, being responsible to nobody except the people who sent me here and to the American people, and no statement will be found in any speech of mine——

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not assume, and never have assumed, to be a spokesman of anybody but myself—and the same thing can not be said of other Senators.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope the Senator from Indiana will observe the propriety of not making a speech in my time.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator must not make statements like that.

Mr. ALDRICH. I am only speaking in this connection of what my impressions were of the speech of the Senator from Indiana. I listened to it carefully from beginning to end, and the impression made upon my mind was that the Senator was speaking here ex cathedra. I venture there was not a Senator who listened who did not have the same impression when the Senator had completed his remarks. Now, I say, Senators, this is too serious and vital a matter for us to dispose of upon any such hypothesis as that.

I was saying, when the Senator last interrupted me, that this was simply a practical question of administration. I was saying that the President of the United States has a right to his opinion about it and the Senator from Indiana certainly has a right to his opinion; but let us look at the question itself, divested, if you please, of all this extraneous talk about war and peace, about loyalty and disloyalty, as to the friends of the Navy and the opponents of the Navy—let us divest it of all of that and look at it as a practical question. Every Senator who has any knowledge of this subject knows that the building of great navies has been a slow process of evolution. Ships that are valuable to-day may, ten years from now, be of absolutely no use. We have saved money and gained by the experience of other countries very largely by not building an immense number of ships. As I said on yesterday, I remember on this floor hearing a discussion after the opening of the great contest between Japan and Russia, in which it was stated that every naval authority took it for granted that we would have to build no more large ships, but that we would build instead more torpedo boats and torpedo-boat destroyers. The President of the United States, in the message which he sent here two or three years ago, recommended that we build one battle ship a year, recognizing the difficulties in the way of arriving at a type which would be valuable to us through all time. He has changed his mind, as he undoubtedly had a right to.

Now, let us look at this question a little further. Is there any reason at this time why we should provide for four battle ships? The legislative power of the Congress of the United States does not cease when the roll is called upon this amendment. If any clouds should darken the sky of our peaceful prosperity, if Congress were not in session, how long would it take the President of the United States to summon a special session of Congress to provide, not for two battle ships, but for as many as were necessary to meet the emergencies which might arise? It will take three years at least to build any of these ships. The cloud which the Senators see in the skies will disappear from even their vision long before any such contingency will arise. Does either of these Senators, who have suddenly become so learned in naval matters, believe that the type of these ships is to be the ultimate type which is to be adopted by the naval authorities and by the governments of the world?

I have not yet heard one single argument why two ships will not do as well as four. Now, there is another side to this question, and I propose to detain the Senate but a very short time in calling attention to that side, because while I believe that patriotism and love of country and devotion to national interests should first control the acts of an American Senator, still there is another side, which we are bound to take into consideration if we discharge our duty. Since the Spanish-American war we have had an era of extravagance in expenditures. There has been apparently little limit to appropriations and expenditures. With prosperity, a degree of prosperity that the world has never before known, our revenues mounted higher and higher every month, and we evidently, and perhaps naturally, thought there was no limit and should be no limit to our appropriations for the public service.

But a change has taken place. The revenues of the country are falling off. The deficiency in the month of April will be more than $11,000,000. The deficiency for the present fiscal year will be at least $60,000,000. What is the duty of Congress in this emergency? The appropriation bills now in this Chamber or in the other provide for an increase of appropriations over those made last year of a hundred and four million dollars; and the end is not yet. There is a public buildings bill, which will probably pass, which may add $20,000,000 to that, making an increase of appropriations in this fiscal year over the last of a hundred and twenty-four million dollars, and this with a deficiency in revenue this year of $60,000,000.

What do Senators propose to do about this? There is a suggestion made, which I imagine may eventuate in some results, that the committees of the two Houses shall in the near future, with a view of revising our revenue laws, consider the tariff and the revenues of the country. If such a committee is appointed, as things now stand and with the rapidity of increases in the expenditures, the principal duty of that committee will be to find new sources of revenue for the Government. New sources of taxation must be found, or the present revenue-producing taxes and custom duties must necessarily be increased.

I call the attention of the members of this body to that serious situation. If I thought that the peace of the United States or its honor or the welfare of the American Navy depended upon these additional battle ships, I would not hesitate to vote for two or twenty. But there is no such question here, gentlemen. No man will rise in this body and say, and there is no member of the executive branch of the Government who will say, we are to have any war within the next two or three years or at any other time in the near future. I do not say by that that war is impossible. It is not necessary to say that. I say it is very improbable. We can not compete with Great Britain in a navy. There is no reason why we should. The efficiency of our Navy is of more consequence than its size. Every man who listens to me knows that. Four battle ships will add $8,000,000 per annum to the ordinary expenses of the Navy for their maintenance. Eight million dollars more per annum at least should be added for repairs and depreciation. This authorization means, then, $16,000,000 added every year to the amount raised by taxes to be paid by the people of the United States, for what purpose? To prepare for possible conflicts which, in my judgment, will never occur except in the fancy or imagination of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE].

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it is with great reluctance that I detain the Senate, because I know that Senators are anxious to vote upon this question, and I realize the patience with which the Senator in charge of the bill has conducted the debate and would not willingly abuse. But I feel that it is merely justice to myself that I should give my reasons for the vote which I am about to cast on this question.

I shall vote for the four ships, but I should be very sorry to have it supposed that my reasons for that vote were some of those which have been put forward in the debate here in order to induce votes in that direction. Therefore I have felt it necessary to explain briefly why I shall give my vote for four ships.

I do not think, Mr. President, that I need to protest my interest in the Navy of the United States. I may be permitted to say, however, that it did not begin with the introduction of this bill in the House of Representatives a month ago, nor with this debate. Before I ever came to Congress, owing to certain strong personal ties, I had a very deep interest in the Navy, and my convictions of public policy, uniting with my personal inclinations, have always led me to support the Navy in every direction in which it was possible for me to do so.

I was not in Congress when the new Navy began, for the new Navy was begun under the Administration of President Arthur, when on the recommendation of Secretary Chandler the 20 per cent limitation of repairs was put on, thus preventing the continued rebuilding of the old and worthless wooden ships. The 20 per cent limitation ended that. In the Administration of President Arthur we built the first three ships of the new Navy—the Chicago, the Boston, and the Atlanta. The Boston served with distinction in the battle of Manila, and all three ships are on the active list of the Navy to-day.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. McCREARY. Is it not true that in the Fiftieth Congress the first appropriation was made for a battle ship in the United States?

Mr. LODGE. The first appropriation for a battle ship properly so called was made in 1890. I was on the committee which framed the appropriation. It was when Mr. Harrison was President and Mr. Tracy was Secretary of the Navy. I was on the committee which framed the appropriation for the first three seagoing coast-defense battle ships, heavily armored ships—the Massachusetts, the Indiana, and the famous Oregon.

Mr. McCREARY. I desire to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I remember very well when Mr. Herbert was chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House, and during Cleveland's Administration an appropriation was made for the first battle ship that was authorized to be constructed. That was in the Fiftieth Congress.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is entirely mistaken. Mr. Herbert was Secretary of the Navy under Mr. Cleveland's second Administration. The Massachusetts and the Indiana, all good for the line of battle to-day, were authorized in 1890. I myself helped to frame the bill.

Mr. McCREARY. I refer to the first Administration.

Mr. LODGE. In President Cleveland's first Administration Mr. Whitney was Secretary of the Navy. He was a strong and good friend of the Navy. No battle ship, properly so called, was built under that Administration; but the Navy was advanced and some large armored cruisers were built.

Mr. PERKINS. I am sure the Senator from Massachusetts wishes to have the record correct. He is not correct. In 1886 Congress authorized the building of the battle ship Texas and the battle ship Maine.

Mr. LODGE. I was going to say, when the Senator interrupted me, that under Mr. Whitney they built the Texas, which was classed erroneously as a battle ship, which was a failure and is to-day practically worthless. The Maine was another armored cruiser. They were armored cruisers. They were not true battle ships and their description as "second-class battle ships" is meaningless. The point is really of no consequence. I am not reflecting upon Mr. Whitney's administration of the Navy. He was a good Secretary and did everything he could to advance the interests of the Navy.

Mr. McCREARY. I agree with the Senator from California in his statement that the first appropriation was made in 1886, and Mr. Cleveland was President at that time. I do not like to be personal, but I happened to be in the chair, presiding in the House of Representatives, when the amendment to the naval appropriation bill was offered and I can not be mistaken about it. It was in 1886.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. I am not able to throw any particular light upon the exact time when the first battle ship was constructed, but I happen to have before me a statement of the expenditures of the Navy, which it occurs to me does throw some light upon when the new Navy began. It shows that in the Fiftieth Congress, in 1888, the naval expenditures were increased from $16,489,000 to $26,263,000 in round figures.

The Senator from Massachusetts, of course, as I assume, did not intend to cast any unnecessary reflection upon the battle ship Texas. If he did, I invite his attention to the unparalleled record of that ship in the battle of Santiago.

Mr. LODGE. The conduct of the Texas in the battle of Santiago had nothing to do with the value of the ship. American sailors would fight well on a raft.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. One moment. I should like to finish what I was saying. The Texas was built on English plans, which were bought by the Secretary of the Navy at that time. She never was a good ship. She did good service at Santiago unquestionably. She is completely obsolete now, and any inquiry of the Department will satisfy Senators that she never was a first-rate ship. I am not saying this to reflect upon anybody. I was here when Mr. Whitney was Secretary of the Navy. He was an excellent Secretary of the Navy. He promoted the Navy in every possible way. But the new Navy did not begin then. It began absolutely with the well-known limitation with respect to the old wooden ships, and the first three new modern ships were the Chicago, the Boston, and the Atlanta—all in the Navy to-day. The Texas and Maine were not battle ships under the proper definition of the term, but the Maine was a good ship according to the standard of that time.

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator from Massachusetts now permit me?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I want to state that I do not think the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] intended to reflect on anyone, but I also think he is mistaken when he says the Texas and the Maine were not battle ships. They were built and classed as second-class battle ships, and they have been so rated ever since. If you will consult——

Mr. LODGE. I have here a list of the battle ships of the United States, and if the Senator will point out to me the Texas among them——

Mr. MONEY. It may have been dropped out as the Senator says, as a worthless ship, or it may not have been included in this rating. But I want to say that the Texas was built under peculiar circumstances. The fact is that the plans for the Texas were brought over here from England, after having been twice submitted to two foreign nations and rejected. The plans were fought over in the Bureau of Construction by the different engineers of the United States, and Mr. Bowles, a young engineer, who afterwards rose to great distinction, advocated the building of the Texas from those plans, and his view was contested by all the older officers. Secretary Whitney concluded to accept Bowles's judgment, and he accepted the plans, and paid for them. He said:

Since you have advocated this plan, I will make you responsible for it, and make you build the ship.

It has been told to me very frequently, and I believe it, although I do not know whether it is true or not, that when Bowles began to consider the question of flotation connected with the plans accepted he thought he had undertaken too much, and he caused the skimping, as they term it, of the timbers and scantling of the ship. When she went into Hampton Roads she struck an obstruction and her bottom "buckled up." She has been repaired two or three times since.

I want to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts, who is well informed generally, to the fact that Captain Glass, who commanded the Texas in 1898, said there was not a better fighting ship in our American Navy. Whether she has been dropped from the rating of battle ships I do not know. But she was in the naval registry as a second-class battle ship.

I am obliged to the Senator from Massachusetts for yielding to me.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I did not rise to discuss the history of the Texas, which is a very unimportant point. It is a ship universally known to be a failure. I meant simply to refer to the past as indicating my own interest in the Navy and as in part explaining why I shall vote in favor of the four-ships amendment.

I do not so vote because I apprehend war. I know of no menace or threat of war now impending over the United States. I am aware of no war cloud on the horizon. No one has informed me of any danger of war, either in my capacity as Senator or as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I do not think there is any cause to apprehend war with any people or that we have any reason to expect that anyone will make war upon us.

I am quite aware, without laying any special claim to erudition, that wars often come unexpectedly. I am also aware that history shows that some wars have been expected and prepared for. It is no answer to the statement I am making, of my personal belief and judgment, that wars occur suddenly. Men can only judge from the conditions known to them. I do not know of any cause to apprehend war at this time, and I should be very sorry to have it supposed that I was voting for four battle ships, which it will take three years to build, because I expect war or think the country is menaced by war.

I am quite aware, as I have said, that wars arise unexpectedly, and also that wars are expected and prepared for. I know of the dangers which exist in this country from the outbreak of citizens in given localities and of the prevalence in certain quarters of what is to me the monstrous idea that one State can disregard treaty obligations and plunge forty-five other States into war and that the United States has nothing to say about it.

Mr. President, I realize the danger which arises from that mistaken state of feeling; but yet I do not believe that there is any present danger of war in that direction. But there is no question that the talk about war is liable to produce a situation from which war may come. If I thought war was near us, I should not for one moment think of predicting it or suggesting it on this floor. I should endeavor to the extent of my poor ability to get the Senate to make provision for a war which I believed imminent, and should say as little about it in public as possible. Incessant talk and hinting at indications of danger from one country or another country is the way very often that the unexpected war is stimulated and brought on. There is only one thing more ill advised and mischievous, and that is to sneer at other countries by name and explain that they would not dare to go to war with us or are too poor to do so.

I do not reflect on any country. I do not suggest that war is coming from this quarter or from that; nor do I belittle or sneer at any country by doing so. It is wise also to bear in mind what Hamlet said when he swore his friends to secrecy:

> You * * * never shall,
> With arms encumber'd thus, or this head-shake,
> Or by pronouncing of some doubtful phrase,
> As "Well, well, we know," or "We could, an' if we would,"
> Or "If we list to speak," or "There be, an' if they might,"
> Or such ambiguous giving out, to note
> That you know aught of me.

Mr. President, I think that sort of indication, or mysterious hinting at, that shaking the head and looking wise has very frequently just as much effect in giving the impression of the danger of war as the direct statement, and I feel strongly inclined at the moment to go on with Hamlet's speech and say as he says a moment later:

> Rest, rest, perturbed spirit!

Mr. President, wars are fostered and brought on by loose talk about the dangers of war, and as a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, who takes some pains to keep himself informed on such subjects, I want to disclaim any such idea in any vote that I give.

Also, Mr. President, I do not want it supposed that I vote as I do because I think our Navy weak or insufficient. I do not agree with the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES] that we have eleven obsolete ships. We have some ships begun in 1890 that are not in speed and in improvements up to the standard of the ships built last year. There is no doubt about that. But those ships in 1890, I am told on the best naval authority, are perfectly able to take their place in the battle line to-day. When Senators make that statement about obsolete ships they seem to forget that the lists of ships of other countries represent ships built during a period of years just like our own, and when you are comparing navy with navy it does not do to start with the assumption that the enemy's fleet is made up entirely of ships built last year while some of ours date back to 1890.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. PILES. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if in his judgment this Government would build any more ships of the type of the eleven to which I referred?

Mr. LODGE. I do not know what eleven the Senator referred to.

Mr. PILES. I had a list of them here yesterday.

Mr. LODGE. I will take the oldest ships——

Mr. PILES. Take the ships——

Mr. LODGE. The Oregon, the Indiana, and Massachusetts. Our Navy Department thinks those vessels are good enough to spend a half a million apiece on them in order to repair them.

Mr. PILES. I am not discussing that question.

Mr. LODGE. Very well. Then, they must be of some value. I am talking of the very oldest ships on the list. I say those three ships—and I say it on good naval authority—are fit to take their position in battle line to-day, and they carry very heavy guns.

Mr. PILES. That was not the question. I am asking whether the Government would build any more ships of that type. I do not mean to say that some of those ships are not in condition to take their place, for what they are worth, or would not be useful to a certain extent. But when I suggest that the ships are of an obsolete type I mean that the Government would not build any more ships of that type, in view of the character of ships that the other nations of the world are building.

Mr. LODGE. No one proposes to build ships of the Oregon or Indiana type. Those were the best types of that day. They are still useful, effective ships, fit for the battle line. We want now to have the corresponding type built that is the best possible type to-day. My point is that other navies extend over an equal period of years. Other navies are not made up of Dreadnoughts built last year. They range from ships of 1890 down to ships of last year.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me? I do not want to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. I yield; certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. With respect to the eleven ships referred to, I will ask the Senator if it is not true that they are chiefly useful now for coast defense purposes?

Mr. LODGE. I do not know what the eleven ships referred to are.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Alabama, Illinois, Indiana, Kearsarge, Kentucky, Maine, Massachusetts, Oregon, Wisconsin, and so forth.

Mr. LODGE. Some of those ships whose names the Senator has read are first-class battle ships, as good as any in the world.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator permit a further interrogatory?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. There is not a single one of those battle ships that is of 12,000 tons except the Maine, which is 12,500 tons. Some of them are as low as 10,300 tons.

Mr. LODGE. I am aware of that.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator, I hope, does not think, because my information from high naval authority is to the contrary, that they are equal to the best battle ships of the world?

Mr. LODGE. Well, Mr. President, I do not intend to compete in naval knowledge with the Senator from Indiana. I have studied it for a great many years, and I can only give my best judgment.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. LODGE. I shall go on when the Senator is through.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish to ask a question, if the Senator does not object to being interrupted.

Mr. LODGE. No; the Senator can ask any question.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. With of course only the limited knowledge that I have on this subject, but which I acquired directly and quite recently from the highest naval authority in this country, I understand that all the ships I have named are of an out-of-date type, and further that of these the Alabama, Indiana, Iowa, Maine, Massachusetts, and Oregon are not with the fleet but are being overhauled.

Mr. LODGE. They are now being repaired.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Is it not true that the Massachusetts, which the Senator from Maine said yesterday was with the fleet on its cruise, is now dismantled in the navy-yard?

Mr. LODGE. On the Indiana the repairs are nearly completed. I think the other two are under repair.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I shall not interrupt the Senator further at this time. I have the information myself directly and immediately, which I shall present later.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, this argument proceeds as if the navies of the rest of the world had no ships of types that have been improved, as if they had nothing but ships built last year. Their fleets extend over a similar period.

Moreover, it is by no means a settled fact that the ship of great size is going to prove the best fighting ship. Admiral Capps and Admiral Converse, both men of great experience and knowledge—I think superior, probably, as experts to anyone here—said in the Senate committee hearings that they would as lief command the South Carolina and Michigan as a Dreadnought, and could make, in their judgment, as good a fight with them. It is by no means a proved case for the big ship, although I favor the Dreadnoughts.

The point I am making is that the idea that our Navy is an insufficient navy is a complete mistake. Take it and compare it ship by ship with the navies of the world to-day. Of course I bar England. England builds her navy on what is known as the "two-power standard." Her standard is that she shall more than equal the combined navies of any two powers in the world. We of course have never intended to rival the British standard. I believe, as a very conservative and sensible Senator said to me yesterday, who will probably vote differently from myself on this bill, that "we should not attempt to have a navy as big as England, but we should always have a navy a little better and more powerful than that of any other country." That, I believe, is the condition of the American Navy to-day.

When the President made his recommendation of one battle ship a year, about which so much has been said, he was making that recommendation under the conditions then existing, and is not in the least inconsistent in what he now recommends. That was before the introduction of the large ships familiarly known as the Dreadnought class. It is the introduction of the big ships which has changed the naval situation. It is not that the American Navy as a whole is not strong; is not, as foreign observers and native experts alike testify, one of the best in the world. It is because in that particular type of ship we are as yet not up to the other powers, and that is the ground on which I desire to put my vote.

We have two Dreadnoughts building. We authorize here two more. I should be glad to see that authorization raised to four for the purpose of making that branch of the Navy proportionately strong with the rest of the list. I want to keep the Navy just where it is, better and more powerful than that of any other power except England; and I do not want to do it, Mr. President, because I think there is war impending or that we have got to look for trouble in some distant ocean. I do it, as I have always supported all the ships for the Navy, because I think it is a great measure of peace.

The Senator from Indiana said yesterday that to appropriate all this money—I wrote the words down at the moment—would be to "filch it from the pockets of the people if there was no danger of war." Mr. President, if there was danger of war it would be simply folly to sit here debating about a naval programme which it will take three years to carry out. The business of the Senate and of the Congress of the United States under those conditions would be to give the Government twenty or thirty millions and let them go out into the world and buy any Dreadnoughts they could find in any yard. That would be a war measure.

The purpose of this programme, and the only reason that such a programme can have, is because some of us believe very strongly that the Navy is a guaranty of peace and that if it had not been for our building up a strong navy we might have been involved in war before.

I agree with the Senator from Rhode Island that the mere presence of a navy perhaps never prevented a specific war, but there is not any doubt in the world in my mind that the English fleet has meant peace for England—so much so that she has not had a serious war since the battle of Waterloo. If it had not been for her navy she would have been attacked again and again and her colonies would have been torn from her.

It is the same way, Mr. President, with our two great coasts. I believe that a navy second only to that of England is necessary for the preservation of the peace of the United States. I place my vote on no other ground. I deprecate any debate which reflects in the remotest way on friendly nations, which would intimate in any way that we are building ships in order to fight somebody in the future. Nothing could tend to bring on the very war that we do not want more than such challenges as that. There are abundant reasons and good reasons now, in my judgment, for making our Navy powerful, for increasing it particularly in this branch of the Dreadnoughts, without rising up here to flutter the wings of war in the faces of the other nations of the earth.

Mr. President, I wish to disclaim any knowledge which would lead me to vote war appropriations for the Navy. I have not sought to pry into the confidence of the Executive. I do not think that his special message was lightly sent. I believe it was sent with a grave sense of responsibility. I know no more about it than all the world or than those who heard it read, and I give it very great weight, indeed.

One hundred years ago, Mr. President, a distinguished predecessor of mine in this Chamber, who was subsequently President of the United States, when a Democratic President sent in a message recommending a warlike measure, broke from his own party and said, "The President recommends this on his high responsibility. I would not debate. I would not deliberate. I would act." The Democrats at that time received the adhesion of this eminent Federalist without any disturbance of feeling about Executive usurpation, and welcomed his support of Mr. Jefferson on that measure.

I think, Mr. President, that without exaggerating Executive power unduly, but recognizing merely that the Executive is necessarily charged with the conduct of our naval affairs and has a knowledge of our relations with foreign countries which in the nature of things can not be communicated to anyone probably but the Secretary of State, it may be properly said that the recommendation of the President should lead us all to give great weight to what he advises, as I most certainly do. His words have great influence upon my action.

But, Mr. President, I take what he says and what he recommends as he says it, and I do not take it through any interpreter. To that message I give great weight. To my own belief as to the necessity of enlarging this branch of the Navy I give even more weight. For these reasons I shall vote for four battle ships.

But I wish, Mr. President, once again and in reiteration to disclaim all sympathy with this talk of war impending here and there. I think it is mischievous internationally, and very dangerous. I dislike references to other friendly powers, whether in alarm or, what is even worse, in contempt. If we have to go into questions like that, this is not the arena for it. I do not believe, according to the best knowledge that I can get, that there is any ground for such dismal prophecies of war or for rumors of war. I prefer to place my vote on what seem to me grounds which are relative and reasonable at all seasons, which imply neither alarm nor contempt, which reflect on no one, and which are entirely valid and proper at this moment in a time of profound and, I believe, uninterrupted peace.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, every patriotic American believes in a great, strong navy. He believes in having ships equal to those of any other nation, with guns and other equipment equal to those belonging to any other nation. Armed and with officers and men who are American citizens, that navy is invincible.

I believed, Mr. President, from my cursory examination of the legislation and my knowledge of the work of the Committee on Naval Affairs during many years past, that we had a pretty good navy until we heard the speech yesterday of my friend from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] and my friend from the State of Washington [Mr. PILES]. Their criticisms of the Committee on Naval Affairs struck me very forcibly. For thirty years the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. HALE] has been a member of one branch or the other of Congress, and during those thirty years he has been a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs. Every bill proposing an appropriation for the building up of the Navy during that time has received his assent or has been presented to Congress by him. I am reminded of a passage I once read in the good Book of Books, which reads:

> Let not him that girdeth on his armor boast himself as he that putteth it off.

And so with my friends who have recently come into Congress. With more ability perhaps than the members of the Naval Committee, they have not given this subject-matter perhaps the same consideration that your Committee on Naval Affairs have given to it.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. PERKINS. With pleasure.

Mr. PILES. I should like to inquire of the Senator from California what criticism I made of the Committee on Naval Affairs?

Mr. PERKINS. By their inaction in not giving four battle ships instead of two.

Mr. PILES. I made no criticism of the Naval Committee.

Mr. PERKINS. By inference, certainly.

Mr. PILES. I have no objection to the Senator voting against four battle ships if he thinks they are unnecessary, but I do object to the Senator putting something in my mouth which I did not say or endeavoring to make it appear that I have criticised the Naval Committee of the Senate. I made no criticism of the Naval Committee. I stated the reasons why I concluded to vote for four battle ships, and if that is criticism of the Naval Committee I am unable to understand it.

Mr. PERKINS. I am very sorry I misunderstand the Senator. I am glad to know he approves of the action of the Committee on Naval Affairs and that by inference he will now vote with the committee.

Mr. PILES. I have not said that I approved of the conduct of the Committee on Naval Affairs in reporting four battle ships. I did not consider it was my place to criticise the Committee on Naval Affairs any more than I considered it the duty of the Senator from California to criticise Senators who have lately taken their seats in this body.

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly I am not criticising anyone adversely, but I want to commend the labor of the Committee on Naval Affairs in the Senate, of all excepting myself, for I have had the honor of being a member of that committee for fifteen years, and during that time there has been no minority report ever presented to Congress. They have taken up the question, giving it every consideration possible, and the result of their investigations and deliberations has been what they believed to be for the best interests of the Navy and the honor of our country.

The Senator from Washington certainly pictured the defenseless condition of the Pacific coast, and it is that, perhaps, which prompts me at this time to make a response to his criticism in that respect. Parenthetically, I want to say I received a letter this morning from a friend in Seattle stating that there were fifteen ships of war anchored in Puget Sound, near the home of my friend from Washington. There were fifteen ships of war there on last Saturday. Certainly, Mr. President, they are not in a very defenseless condition on Puget Sound.

When I became a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs there was not, Mr. President, a single battle ship in commission. As has been stated, the Texas had been authorized, the Maine had been authorized, and several others had been authorized to be built, but there was not a single one afloat, and none went into commission until the Maine went into commission. The Maine and Texas were commissioned in 1895, the cruiser New York in 1893, the Oregon, Massachusetts, and Indiana in 1896, and the Iowa and Brooklyn in 1897.

In 1893 the naval appropriations amounted to $23,611,000. We had outlined a programme that had been inaugurated by Secretary Chandler and was carried out by Secretary Whitney and by his successors in office. We believed that plan of developing our Navy would give us one second to none in the world. We believe we have accomplished that, Mr. President, and to-day this bill, instead of $23,611,000, as it did in 1893, carries $123,000,000, in round numbers, for the building up of the Navy. In 1893 we rated as the fifth naval power in the world. To-day we are the second naval power in the world, and with ships and armament equal to that of any in the world.

There is one phase of this question which has not been presented here, and that is the number of guns that the ships carry. A ship without guns is as useless as "a painted ship upon a painted ocean," so far as being for offensive or defensive purposes is concerned. The question of the guns has not been spoken of at all. It is the keystone of the efficiency, effectiveness, and power of our Navy.

I want to state the armament of 12 and 13 inch guns on our battle ships that we have and those of Great Britain, France, Germany, and Japan.

Great Britain has built of 12-inch guns 162, 32 13-inch guns, and is building 60 12-inch guns, making a total of 222 guns.

The United States has built 68 12-inch guns, 32 13-inch guns, and is now building 36 12-inch guns, making a total of 136 all told.

France has only 93 all told; Germany has 56 12 and 13 inch guns on her battle ships, building and all told. Japan has, all told, building and built, 68. The United States therefore has more than double the number guns that Japan has. I will place the statement in the RECORD for reference.

The statement referred to is as follows.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. PERKINS. With pleasure.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood the Senator from California to say that the United States is the second naval power in the world.

Mr. PERKINS. It is the second naval power in the world.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator whether he thinks she should remain the second naval power in the world?

Mr. PERKINS. I do, Mr. President; and I think we should be proud of that position.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I would like to ask the Senator this question: Suppose Germany to-day has authorized or will authorize four battle ships each year until the year 1917 of the Dreadnought type. How does the Senator expect the United States to hold her position as the second naval power in the world if we do not build battle ships equal to the other nations that are now lower than we are in the scale?

Mr. PERKINS. The Senator from Indiana yesterday ventured into the domain of prophecy and it has not redounded, judging from the speech of my friend from Rhode Island, to his credit. My friend from Utah should profit by his example, perhaps, and not prophesy what Germany is going to do. As a matter of fact, she has not authorized those ships. It is a newspaper story and there is no authentic record that she has done so.

Mr. HALE. I will say to the Senator from Utah that we have to-day nothing authentic about the future programme of Germany. We do not yet know what that programme is.

Mr. SMOOT. The reason why I asked the question is because I have been informed, and from a source that I thought was absolutely reliable, that the order for those battle ships has been made, and that they will be built. I may be mistaken. I simply asked the question, basing the question upon the belief that those ships had been ordered and would be built.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. PERKINS. With pleasure.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will state again that my statement yesterday, which I read from the paper I held in my hand, was furnished to me as an authentic statement from the highest possible authority on naval matters that we can get. I think that the opinion of the world is that that is true.

Now, one point more. The Senator from California says that we are the second naval power in the world.

Mr. PERKINS. I do.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I ask the Senator if that is not arrived at by merely considering tonnage?

Mr. PERKINS. My authority is Lord Brassey's Annual, who is a recognized authority on naval affairs throughout the world. My second authority is that of the Navy Department of the United States Government.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The statement that we are the second naval power in the world I have looked into a little bit in the last forty-eight hours, and the estimate is made merely by placing the respective tonnage of the various nations in amount, we appearing the second. If you remove what is termed by very competent men, who give their lives to the subject—of course, I know nothing about it, as compared with what the Senator from California does, personally—the ships that are now practically obsolete and to be used for coast defense purposes and the other tonnage that is useful for nothing, that place is of course wiped out.

If the third fact be considered—that is to say, if it is true, and it is the weight of all the naval authority I can get hold of (and I am merely stating their opinion), it is recognized all over the world that since the Russo-Japanese war the type of the fighting ship is the Dreadnought, or the eighteen and twenty thousand ton ship. Therefore, from that point of view, as a matter of fighting strength and not merely of paper tonnage, we are not the second power in the world, but more nearly the fifth.

On that particular statement I tried to get the opinion this morning, and succeeeded in doing so, of what the nation has a right to accept as the most competent naval opinion in the world.

Mr. PERKINS. Does the Senator challenge my statement of the number of guns carried in the battle ships?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not challenge any statement the Senator makes. Any statement the Senator makes I will accept.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly; we want all the light we can get on this subject.

Mr. SMOOT. As far as I am personally concerned, I think a number of our ships are obsolete. I also think that the question of tonnage cuts very little figure in this discussion, for no doubt every other naval power in the world has obsolete ships as well as we.

But what I want to ask the Senator is, If it be true that Germany has ordered the four ships built each year until the year 1917 of the Dreadnought type, would the Senator, then, be in favor of the United States building four ships at this time or only two?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I am in favor of the naval programme laid down not only by this Administration, but by the three previous Administrations and carried out by the Committees on Naval Affairs in both the House of Representatives and in the Senate, and approved of generally by the Department; and I want to say that it is approved of by the President, notwithstanding the special message that came in the other day.

In passing I wish to say that I had a feeling at least kindred to resentment when the charge was made by my friend from Indiana yesterday that those who did not vote for four battle ships in accordance with the recommendation of the President and his special message were not loyal to our Government, and certainly did not show a proper respect for the President of the United States as Commander in Chief of the Navy. Mr. President, no one has greater admiration or respect for the President of the United States than I have. I honor him for his great ability. I honor him for his high character and for his integrity of purpose. Therefore, because we do not agree with him on a simple business proposition as to whether we shall build two or four ships, it is unfair in my friend from Indiana to say that we are not showing proper respect to the Commander in Chief of our Navy.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. PERKINS. With pleasure.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Of course the Senator will find that I said no such thing as that. I am not responsible for any——

Mr. PERKINS. The Senator did in his impassioned appeal yesterday. If he did not, then I can not understand the English language.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Very well; then let the Senator take that as his impression. I will not go into that now, but later. I wish simply to call the attention of the Senator, if he will permit me, to another point.

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Is it so much a question whether we have obsolete ships, as other nations also have obsolete ships, as it is a question whether or not we have ships in proportionate number of the latest type at all comparable to other nations? The Navy, as I take it, in a common-sense view, is not to be reckoned by the number of ships or the tonnage, but by its effective fighting strength compared with that of other nations.

I have before me here, and I do not want to vex the Senator's patience, a list of the most modern battle ships of the other countries of the world and also our own, and according to that statement we are in an uncomfortably inferior position.

Mr. HALE. The Senator has got it all wrong.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I have it merely from information that is the highest I can get.

Mr. HALE. So have I.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the Senator from Maine has higher information, of course I will not dispute it. I must take the best information I can get.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I was about to say that I think I am in full accord with the proposition as to these battle ships. In his message to the first session of the Fifty-ninth Congress the President stated as follows:

> We have most wisely continued for a number of years to build up our Navy, and it has now reached a fairly high standard of efficiency. This standard of efficiency must not only be maintained, but increased. It does not seem to me necessary, however, that the Navy should—at least in the immediate future—be increased beyond the present number of units. What is now clearly necessary is to substitute efficient for inefficient units as the latter become worn-out or as it becomes apparent that they are useless. Probably the result would be attained by adding a single battle ship to our Navy each year, the superseded or out-worn vessels being laid up or broken up as they are thus replaced.

That we have been doing. The President again stated in his message in the second session of the Fifty-ninth Congress, on December 3, 1906:

> I do not ask that we continue to increase our Navy. I ask merely that it be maintained at its present strength, and this can be done if we replace the obsolete and out-worn ships by new and good ones, the equal of any afloat in any navy.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. PERKINS. In a moment.

Mr. President, we carried out the President's policy. In 1906 we built two ships, when the President said but one would be necessary, and in 1907 we authorized an appropriation for two ships, when the President said that only one would be necessary. This year we are appropriating for two battle ships in this bill as it comes from the Committee on Naval Affairs. That makes six ships, counting one ship for 1906, one for 1907, and the four he recommends now. Now I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from California has read from the President's messages of former times.

Mr. PERKINS. Only in the last Congress.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The last Congress expired over a year ago. I call the Senator's attention to the fact, as he will see in a moment, that the President in his special message gives the reasons why he departs from that view.

Mr. PERKINS. But have we not already built six ships?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The President thinks we should have four more, or, of course, he would not have sent his special message.

Concerning the other matter about which I am speaking, since the Senator made that point I have received a list of the effective fighting ships of the best type of this and other countries, and that list, which I shall probably refer to later, shows——

Mr. PERKINS. Will the Senator please give me their kinds, the number of guns they carry, and their caliber?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It does not show the guns. It gives the names of the ships and their tonnage. They are along the line of the Dreadnought class.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. There is but one ship on the waters of the world of the Dreadnought type. That is the British Dreadnought. It takes years to construct such a ship. There are talks and rumors about programmes.

The Senator from Indiana cited France. France has adopted no such large programme as the Senator indicates, nor has Germany, and it will be years before any other great ships of that kind will be put on the waters of the globe. We will get ours on as quickly as any other nation; and when it is assumed that we are behind in this type it is a mistake, for we are no more behind than is any other nation. We are keeping up our Navy, we have kept it up, and will keep it up without being dragooned into an extreme and expensive programme at a particular time.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, with the Senator's indulgence——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly. If the committee are wrong on this proposition, we want to be set aright.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think the committee itself will admit that the statement of the Senator from Maine, that there is only one ship in the world of the Dreadnought type, is not accurate.

Mr. HALE. On water?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes, sir; on water.

Mr. HALE. Where is she?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. In England. The Temeraire and the Bellerophon are both of heavier tonnage. The ones I named yesterday are building; they are on the stocks or are authorized. France has seven larger than the Dreadnought. On the programme for 1908 are six of 21,000 tons.

Mr. HALE. When the Senator talks about programmes he has not got the legally authorized construction. He has merely got the programme.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Well, the first I mentioned was not merely the programme, but a thing actually in being. So far as the information is concerned, however, it is the same information and from the same source from which the committee itself had to get any information which it got.

But I do not want to take the Senator's time further. I merely wanted to call attention to the fact that the Senator was not quite accurate when he said that there was only one Dreadnought on the waters, because there are several now, according to this information. The paper I hold in my hand is a careful verification of the statements made from the information I gave yesterday; and, so far as information can be given to the Senate which will command its respect and credence, certainly, if this is not correct, then no correct information can be had. I shall refer to this later. I am very much obliged to the Senator from California for his patience.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, from 1883 to 1892 we made appropriations which were expended in the construction of new vessels amounting to $49,258,000, as follows:

CONSTRUCTION AUTHORIZED.

1883	$2,440,000
1885	2,967,000
1886	6,834,000
1887	5,386,000
1888	9,191,000
1889	1,567,000
1890	12,187,000
1891	2,690,000
1892	5,996,000
Total	49,258,000

Since then we have appropriated $260,101,190, as follows:

Texas:
Authorized	1886
Commissioned	1895
Maine:
Authorized	1886
Commissioned	1895
New York (armored cruiser):
Authorized	1888
Commissioned	1893
Oregon:
Authorized	1890
Commissioned	1896
Massachusetts:
Authorized	1890
Commissioned	1896
Indiana:
Authorized	1890
Commissioned	1895
Iowa:
Authorized	1892
Commissioned	1897
Brooklyn (armored cruiser):
Authorized	1892
Commissioned	1897
Total cost of all vessels built or building	$309,359,190
Vessels authorized up to 1893	49,258,000
Voted on	260,101,190

The list of the vessels in Admiral Dewey's fleet in the battle of Manila Bay is as follows:

		Tonnage.
Olympia	protected cruiser	5,870
Baltimore	do	4,415
Raleigh	do	3,183
Boston	do	3,000
Concord	gunboat	1,710
Petrel	do	892

Mr. President, with that navy we won our great battle at Manila. We won our battles with Spain on that appropriation of $49,000,000 in the construction of new vessels, while since then, as I have said, we have appropriated $260,101,190. Dewey at Manila had not a single battle ship under his command, and had not, I think, a ship of 6,000 tons. He had the Olympia, the Baltimore, the Raleigh, the Boston, the Concord, and the Petrel, ranging from 5,870 tons down to 892 tons; and yet he won one of the most gallant naval victories in the history of this or any other country.

As to the comparison of the strength of our Navy with that of other nations, I will read from remarks I made in the Senate some few days since, containing statistics which were carefully compiled and which I know to be correct; or they were correct at the time the speech was made, and are so still, unless some other authority, which my friend from Indiana can produce, shall prove the contrary. My statement was:

THE UNITED STATES SECOND IN NAVAL STRENGTH.

It is the opinion of the writer of the above—

That was Lord Brassey—and of many experienced naval men that the only true basis of comparison is total displacement modified by consideration of age. If this basis is adopted and comparison is made with the naval strength of the other principal nations of the world, the United States is found to be second only to Great Britain. The relative order of tonnage of effective fighting vessels stands as follows:

	Tonnage.
Great Britain	1,633,116
United States	611,616
France	609,079
Germany	529,032
Japan	374,701
Russia	232,943
Italy	207,632
Austria	113,235

According to the Bureau of Navigation, the tonnage of all naval vessels built or building November 1, 1907, shows France in the second place, with 836,112 tons, against 771,758 for the United States, and if we authorize two battle ships of the Dreadnought type the figures for the United States will be increased to about 812,000 tons, leaving France still second in tonnage on the sea. But these figures are, in a way, deceptive, for they include coast-defense vessels.

I call my friend's attention to that especially. They are "deceptive, for they include coast-defense vessels"— which are not designed for cruising, and consequently should not figure in our computation of strength on the high seas. If we eliminate these we shall have 766,666 tons for the United States and 762,812 for France, leaving us still second by a small margin. But if we compute the strength of line-of-battle ships—the true fighting strength of the Navy—including battle ships and armored cruisers, we shall find a still greater margin in our favor.

I challenge my friend to contradict or disprove that statement. It was made up and carefully compiled in the Navy Department, and I believe it to be correct.

Mr. President, we all have but one object in view, that which is for the best interests of the country; and I believe the policy that has been inaugurated in the programme I have outlined is a wise one. The only difference to-day on this whole question is simply as to which is the best business policy.

I will ask the Senator from Indiana a question. I should like to have him remain to answer it now. He brushed aside my inquiry yesterday in regard to the lack of officers. When I said the Secretary of the Navy had testified before the committee of the House of Representatives that we were 1,846 officers short even to officer our present ships, he replied to me that, if we would only promote those we have in the service, it would provide an abundance. I find that we have at the Naval Academy 852 midshipmen, and there are 312 midshipmen at sea, making 1,164 midshipmen all told; and some of them had only been in the Academy a year or less. Even if we should promote every one of them, no one for a moment would contend that they are capable of taking the positions of officers on shipboard, any more than a nurse or an interne in a hospital is capable of taking the place of the chief surgeon or physician of the hospital. No one would for a moment think them capable of it. I want to know how and by what mathematics the Senator can solve this problem and provide sufficient officers for these ships? It is a physical impossibility, even without making allowance for death, resignation, or other cause of depletion.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will answer that only by the information furnished by the Department itself—as I have said time and again I have no personal knowledge on the subject—which is, that if the personnel legislation, which has been urged upon Congress for now, I believe, four or five years and has been the subject of at least two messages from the President—if I am wrong the Senator will correct me—had been passed we should have an abundance of officers. I took occasion yesterday to read somewhat from that message of the President and to cite the crying necessity for additional legislation. I quoted from his message respecting the ages of captains in our Navy and in other navies of the world. I am informed—and, as I say, I can only take that information—that the Department itself thinks that we have an abundance of officers if Congress will only enact the personnel legislation which the Department asks and the President urges, and, further, that by the time these four ships, if we should determine to build them, would be completed we should have plenty of officers graduated from the Naval Academy to command them.

Mr. PERKINS. We only graduate from about 175 to 200 annually from the Academy. It would take nine years even to fill up the present deficiency.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The estimate of the Department, as given me yesterday, was that we would have substantially 800 new graduates that could be made into officers by the time the ships could possibly be completed. That is all I know.

Mr. PERKINS. There is no question, Mr. President, but that there is not an ensign in the Navy who would not like to be promoted to a lieutenant; no lieutenant who would not like to be promoted to a commander; no commander who would not like to be promoted to a captain, and no captain who would not like to be promoted to the grade of admiral; but the question is, Are they qualified to discharge those high and important duties?

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves that, for it is a very interesting point, I should like to know, assuming that all that might be done, where would we get the subordinate officers, except only from the midshipmen, who would then be qualified to hold any kind of commission? As I understood the statement the Senator from California made a few moments ago, it was to the effect that there are, all told, only about 1,100 midshipmen.

Mr. PERKINS. One thousand one hundred and sixty-four.

Mr. FORAKER. Some of those have been in the Academy less than a year, and certainly they would not be qualified for the command of a ship.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Oh, no.

Mr. FORAKER. And I do not see how by this personnel bill we are to work such effective results as an increase of nearly 2,000 in the number of officers necessary to give each ship now in commission a proper complement of officers. It will be remembered that in 1899 we passed a naval personnel bill. It was framed, if I mistake not, in accordance with suggestions from the President. Certainly, as I understood at the time, and have understood ever since, it had his entire approbation; but we have all learned, very much to our regret, that that bill, which it was thought would accomplish this purpose so effectually, has failed to accomplish this purpose, and we are still in the very unsatisfactory situation of having more ships to-day than we have officers to command them, the deficiency being almost 2,000.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from Ohio asked me a question. Of course, my only answer to that would be, first, that it is not proposed by any human being that I know of to promote midshipmen to captaincies or even to commanderships or anything of that kind——

Mr. FORAKER. I suppose to lieutenants or ensigns.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But to promote them to be officers and then let them go up in the various grades according to experience and seniority and all that sort of thing. I am informed also by the Department that each ship——

Mr. FORAKER. But the point was, if the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, and the Senator from California does not complain, that if we were to promote every midshipman in the Academy, those who have been there less than a year, as well as those who are soon to be graduated from there, we should still be short practically a thousand officers. Where would the necessary number come from? No personnel bill has provided that we shall make commissioned officers in the Navy from civil life.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, the answer to that is the same, of course, that I have made to the Senator from California, that the Department believes that if the naval personnel bill were enacted, there would be an abundance of officers. I understand that on each one of the ships now on the cruise there are twenty or more midshipmen, and every one of them has completed the course at the Academy.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, I am an enthusiast on the increase of the Navy, and my vote and my influence, if I have any, have been toward the building up of the Navy. I claim that we are working on the proper lines in building up a great Navy. From being the fifth in rank when I had the honor of first becoming a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, we have to-day reached the position of the second naval power in the world.

I differ from some of my colleagues as to the advisability of the mission of the fleet to the Pacific coast. I think it was a wise departure from the routine that has heretofore prevailed to send them around to the Pacific coast. It gives an opportunity of maneuvering the ships at sea, of disciplining, and training the officers and men; and the expense is not so much more than it would be if the ships were cruising up and down the Atlantic coast. The only actual extra expense there can be is the cost of transporting coal in colliers to supply the ships on the voyage around to the Pacific coast.

My views on the increase of the Navy have been shared by the members of that committee; and, Mr. President, I want to repeat what I said before, that there has never been a minority report during the eleven years I have been a member of that committee. It has been wholly nonpartisan. Our Democratic friends have vied with the Republicans in voting for measures that would build up our Navy, and to-day the result of our efforts in that line, I think, is apparent on looking at the register of the vessels which we have to-day in the service.

The voyage of the battle ships to the Pacific coast is a wonderful event in the history of our Navy, and I think it has had a good moral influence. Where they stopped at ports in South America there has been evidence of good fellowship and comity between the nations of South America and the United States. I think the cruise of the fleet to the Pacific coast has reflected great credit on the Navy. Their target practice in Magdalena Bay has been of great value. They have demonstrated very high efficiency as marksmen. Their marksmanship has been equaled by that of no navy in the world; indeed it exceeds that of all other navies of which I have any knowledge. I think, when they make the cruise up that coast from San Diego to Puget Sound, that it will be productive of great benefit to the men and officers on those ships; and wherever they may go from there the voyage will be of great benefit, and they will profit by their experience.

The proposition as to whether we shall build two battle ships or four battle ships, Mr. President, as I said before, is simply a question of business policy. I believe it the part of wisdom for us to profit by the mistakes of other countries and benefit by our own experience. The ships that we built twenty years ago have all been stricken off of the list. We have to-day 100 fighting ships of over a thousand tons and none of them over 20 years old. Of course everyone who is conversant with maritime affairs realizes there must be expense each year in keeping them up, but there is no more on ships in active service, with their engines working, their boilers being fired, if they are properly cared for, their electrical appliances and other apparatus being used and kept in order, than there is if they were tied up at navy-yards. With our 38,000 blue jackets and 8,000 marines, 46,000 men in all in the Navy, and our 3,000 officers, it seems to me that they ought to be kept going somewhere on just such a voyage as the fleet is now making.

My friend from the Puget Sound country [Mr. PILES] is fearful that we are in a defenseless condition. I want to say that the Secretary of the Navy informed me that, prior to the arrival of the Atlantic fleet, which consists of 16 battle ships, we had on the Pacific coast 2 battle ships, 8 armored cruisers, 1 harbor-defense vessel, 9 protected cruisers, 3 torpedo-boat destroyers, 5 torpedo boats, and 2 submarines.

Mr. PILES. Let me ask the Senator what battle ships they were?

Mr. PERKINS. The battle ships on the Pacific coast were the Nebraska and the Wisconsin.

Mr. PILES. The Wisconsin, as I understand, was in dry dock for repairs, and the Nebraska was just fitting out.

Mr. PERKINS. The Nebraska had been built at Puget Sound.

Mr. PILES. It was just completed, and all her crew was not aboard the vessel.

Mr. PERKINS. I want to say, Mr. President, that the Naval Committees in Congress through their recommendations have not neglected the Pacific coast. We have had built on the Pacific coast the Nebraska, the Ohio, the Oregon, the Wisconsin, all first-class battle ships. Of armored cruisers, there were built on the Pacific coast the California and the South Dakota; and two better ships than the California and the South Dakota can not be found in the world in the armored-cruiser class. Of the protected cruisers, the Milwaukee, the Olympia, the San Francisco, and the Tacoma were built on the Pacific coast; and, in addition to that, we have had submarine vessels, torpedo-boat destroyers, and torpedo boats. The Pacific coast is well protected. If we had 100 more vessels, I do not see how it would avail us if the Commander in Chief should order them to other parts of the world—to Asiatic waters, for instance.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator if he thinks that our Navy is large enough properly to defend the Atlantic coast and also the Pacific coast?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, we do not use battle ships to defend our coasts. We use them as vessels of offense and defense—offense principally. We have fortified our ports on the Atlantic and we are doing so on the Pacific coast. This year we have appropriated only $8,000,000 for fortifications and ordnance, while the Department recommended $38,000,000. I think it is better to put the money into forts and fortifications and submarine torpedoes than it is to put it into battle ships for the defense of ports.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply asked the question for information, and I always get it from the Senator, because I know he has had a great deal of experience along this line.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President, with torpedo-boat destroyers, submarine mines, and torpedoes as an auxiliary to our forts, there can be no better defense. San Francisco is one of the best fortified ports in the United States, second only to New York; and we hope to have Puget Sound, where my friend from Washington [Mr. PILES] lives, amply protected. We have provided nearly two and a half million dollars or three million dollars for the fortifications on Puget Sound.

Mr. PILES. The Senator would not say that it is sufficiently fortified at the present time, would he?

Mr. PERKINS. I think it is not, and therefore I cheerfully gave my vote to provide for the proposed fortifications.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not think I exactly understood the Senator in another part of his speech, and I wish to ask him how many battle ships are there now under construction?

Mr. PERKINS. How many have we all told?

Mr. OVERMAN. How many in process of construction at the present time?

Mr. PERKINS. We have and have under contract twenty-nine battle ships. There are four of those now under construction, which are not completed, or at least not placed in commission. With the completion of the two ships provided for in this naval appropriation bill, we shall have thirty-one battle ships.

Mr. OVERMAN. There are four under construction. Does that include armored cruisers?

Mr. PERKINS. Four battle ships have not yet been commissioned, but are under construction.

Mr. du PONT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. du PONT. I will ask the Senator if he does not think the Pacific coast would be better defended by proper fortifications at Pearl Harbor in the Hawaiian Islands? That would make an admirable naval base.

Mr. PERKINS. I think they would be a valuable auxiliary to the defense of the Pacific coast, Mr. President, and this naval appropriation bill has in it an appropriation of $1,000,000 to provide a coaling station at Pearl Harbor, in the Island of Oahu, near Honolulu, and we provided in the fortifications bill a liberal appropriation to fortify that island. It is a base of naval supplies, as the Senator from Delaware so pertinently says. It is a base which is of more value to us on the Pacific coast, perhaps, than any other point that I can think of at this time; certainly equal to anything in the Aleutian Islands, because no nation at war with us could attack the Pacific coast without having some base of supplies and a rendezvous there. That was one of the principal reasons why I voted for liberal appropriations for fortifying the island and for a naval station there. That was one of the reasons why I cast my vote for the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands to the United States. They have been a source of revenue to us and not a disappointment or a care or an anxiety as the Philippine Islands have been. The Philippine Islands, of course, came to us as the result of a great war. We were very magnanimous in that war. After our Navy had wiped out the Spanish fleet, we sent home to Spain, in our own transports, all of her prisoners, and we paid $20,000,000 as a peace offering for the Philippines. This great American people has always been magnanimous to a fallen foe.

As has been stated so well by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], there is no more danger of war with any foreign country than there is of our having any other great catastrophe of which there is no warning given to us. I believe, Mr. President, that this naval appropriation bill is a liberal one and meets the approval of the people generally. I believe that the construction of two battle ships will carry out the programme we have heretofore planned and will be productive of the very best results.

I want to say, in regard to the cruise of our ships to foreign countries, that I look upon the voyage of this great naval fleet not only as promoting good fellowship and comity between the nations, but as promoting respect for the American flag. When as a sailor boy I reached a foreign port and saw, as I did see, the Stars and Stripes waving over the office of the American consul, I felt almost as Moses did when he drew near the burning bush, that I had gazed upon holy ground. By the narrow policy our Government has pursued toward our merchant ships we have virtually wiped them off the sea, and to-day it is well for us and well for the honor of our country that we should send our naval ships into foreign ports, so that other nations may see, honor, and respect our flag.

This bill also has been liberal to the officers of the Navy and the men. It has increased the pay of the officers of the Navy one-fifth—20 per cent—more than we have been paying them. It increases the pay of the men of the Navy 10 per cent. It offers prizes, and in that respect we have followed England. England appropriated £5,000 or more last year for prizes for marksmanship. I believe that instead of increasing the appropriation so as to provide for four battle ships we should put the money into new guns and the improvement of our navy-yards, as we have already done in respect to the appropriation for the Bremerton navy-yard. I believe in building up every navy-yard in the country and in improving our coaling stations. We have provided in this bill for building one of the battle ships in a navy-yard and one of the colliers in a navy-yard, to be built of American material by American mechanics, built under the Stars and Stripes, vessels which shall carry the colors of our country to foreign countries, where people must respect it if they know the great power that is back of it.

In this discussion our friends, including the Senator from Indiana, have not made one reference to the great Hague Conference. We twice there tried to do away with war. We believe in arbitration. The President has sent to us from time to time arbitration treaties. At the Hague Conference twenty-eight nations signed conventions to commit differences of certain classes to arbitration rather than to appeal to arms. Only a few years ago a treaty submitted to arbitration a question of the greatest and most vital importance to this nation, especially to us of the great Northwest, and that was with respect to the boundary line between Alaska and Canada. It was a question which greatly agitated the minds of our people. If it had not been for the wise counsel of that Commission, of which the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts was a member, which went to London and arrived at a decision satisfactory to both parties, dire results might have eventuated. It was reason, it was deliberation, it was patriotism, it was love of our country and our institutions and humanity that caused us to submit the question to arbitration. It resulted in benefit to us all.

So I believe, instead of increasing our Navy more than we have under this programme, we should carry out that which has been recommended by your committee, after weeks of consideration. It has been charged by one of those who oppose our programme that we have not deliberated over it, that we had the bill before us only a few days. As a matter of fact, it was under consideration for weeks and weeks. The Book of Estimates has been before us; the communications from the Navy Department have been submitted to us; and, after considering every recommendation made by the President and the Secretary of the Navy and by the different bureaus of the Navy Department, we have formulated this bill and presented it to you for your consideration. I submit the question to the Senate. I know the Senate believes that the Committee on Naval Affairs, if it has erred, has committed an error of judgment only, and that it has so framed the bill that, in its opinion, the best results will be attained by carrying out its recommendations and, so believing, will sustain the action of your committee.

I will not weary the Senate by recurring to the matter in detail, but with the permission of the Senate will place in the RECORD the list of ships on the Pacific coast.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Battle ships, armored cruisers, protected cruisers, torpedo vessels, and coast-defense vessels of the United States Navy on the Pacific coast January 20, 1908.

Vessel.	Normal displacement.	Speed on trial.	Probable date could be made ready for active service.
Battle ships:	Tons.	Knots.
Nebraska	14,948	19.06	Now in commission.
Wisconsin	11,552	17.17	April 15, 1908.
Armored cruisers:
California	13,680	22.20	Now in commission.
Colorado	13,680	22.24	Do.
Maryland	13,680	22.41	Do.
Pennsylvania	13,680	22.44	Do.
South Dakota	13,680	22.24	January 27, 1908.
Tennessee	14,500	22.16	Now in commission.
Washington	14,500	22.27	Do.
West Virginia	13,680	22.15	Do.
Harbor-defense monitors:
Wyoming	3,225	11.80	May 1, 1908.

Mr. BURROWS obtained the floor.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BURROWS. Does the Senator from Oklahoma desire to take the floor?

Mr. OWEN. No, sir; except for a moment.

Mr. BURROWS. I yield.

Mr. OWEN. I wish to say that in view of the number of speeches that are yet to be on the bill this afternoon, desiring to be heard with regard to the matter before it is disposed of, I should like to have the opportunity on Monday of being heard on this measure, if it meets the approval of the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. The chairman of the committee who has the bill in charge is not present, and I suggest to the Senator from Oklahoma that he make his request later on, in the presence of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, were it not for the fact that I am conscious of a difference of opinion among the people of my own State and in the country generally in relation to the question as to the number of new battle ships to be authorized, I should not care to be heard for a moment. But in view of this division in my State and in the country, I desire to set forth briefly the reasons which will control me in voting against the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES] to increase the number of battle ships to be constructed from two to four. As a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I joined in the report, which, so far as I know, was unanimous in favor of the authorization of but two battle ships at this time.

Before any Senator can determine this question with any degree of satisfaction to himself it will be necessary to call to mind what the strength of our Navy is to-day and then consider the sufficiency of the reasons assigned for this proposed increase. As to the present strength of the Navy, I present the official statement of the Secretary of the Navy, taken from his last annual report and summarized in a table which I will ask to have inserted in my remarks without reading. The heading to this table is as follows:

From this official statement I find that we have classed under the head of the "new Navy" twenty-three battle ships, costing $136,189,402.79; eight armored cruisers, costing $43,742,909.40; eighteen protected cruisers, upon which we have expended in first cost $43,680,210.38; three unprotected cruisers, costing $3,791,312.54, making an aggregate of fifty-two ships, upon which we have expended $227,403,835.11.

It further appears from the report of the Secretary of the Navy that the tonnage of our Navy has more than doubled during the last year, and for the first time in the history of the Navy we have been able to mobilize sixteen battle ships.

But this is not all. I hold in my hand an official table giving a list of vessels in course of construction on November 1, 1907.

From this it appears that we have now under construction, in addition to the ships I have named, seven battle ships, two armored cruisers, three scout cruisers, five torpedo-boat destroyers, two submarines, two colliers, and two other minor craft, making a total of twenty-three in addition to those already completed, and upon which we have already expended $36,454,000.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. OVERMAN. May I ask the Senator from Michigan a question? I ask merely for information. Do I understand that twenty-three vessels are now under construction?

Mr. BURROWS. Yes; twenty-three crafts are now under construction, seven of which are battle ships.

Mr. OVERMAN. Battle ships?

Mr. BURROWS. Yes; and two armored cruisers. I beg to submit here an official table showing the vessels now under construction, their names, and the amount expended thereon to June 30, 1907, which, it will be observed, is $36,454,634.01.

Expenditures on vessels under construction to June 30, 1907.

Torpedo-boat destroyer No. 17	3,160.25	Total	36,454,634.61

Amount expended under increase of the Navy appropriations on all vessels other than those above named (including $2,500,000, approximate cost of equipage of monitors and torpedo boats), $45,500,721.20.

In this connection it is interesting to note that the Secretary of the Navy in his last annual report states the total cost of "all vessels of the new Navy, built and building," to this time is $309,359,190.92.

I also ask to have inserted in my remarks, without reading, a table taken from the report of the Secretary of the Navy, giving a summary of all the vessels in the United States Navy June 30, 1907, from which it appears that there are "fit for service, including those under repair, 285; under construction, 20; authorized, 8; unfit for sea service, 12;" making a total of 325 crafts of all classes, constituting the present strength of our Navy.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. BURROWS. I will also submit an official table showing the war-ship tonnage of the eight leading naval powers of the world, viz, Great Britain, France, United States, Germany, Japan, Russia, Italy, and Austria, from which it can be seen at a glance the naval strength of each nation, the number and character of ships completed and under construction, and the relative order of war-ships tonnage among these naval powers at present and when existing constructions are completed.

[b] Omitting the Iéna.
[c] Includes smaller battle ships and monitors.
[d] All unarmored war ships of more than 1,000 tons are in this table classed according to displacement as cruisers. Scouts are considered as cruisers in which battery and protection have been sacrificed to secure extreme speed. The word "protected" has been omitted because all cruisers except the smallest and oldest now have protective decks.

N. B.—The following vessels are not included in the tables:
Those over 20 years old, unless they have been reconstructed and rearmed since 1900.
Those not actually begun, although authorized.
Transports, colliers, repair ships, torpedo depot ships, converted merchant vessels, or yachts.
Vessels of less than 1,000 tons, except torpedo craft.
Torpedo craft of less than 50 tons.

Mr. BURROWS. From this statement it appears that the United States to-day ranks second among the naval powers of the world.

Mr. President, with such a Navy completed and in course of construction as we possess to-day and at peace with the world, the question arises, What pressing necessity can there be for increasing the limit as fixed in the bill, as it came to the Senate, from two to four battle ships? One of the reasons urged—and I may say the chief one—is the apprehension expressed by certain Senators that we are to have in the immediate future serious trouble with some foreign nation. The Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES] and other Senators—the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE]—are apprehensive that we are to have difficulty with some nation somewhere; and the Senator from Washington especially, while disclaiming a belief that there is any immediate danger of trouble with Japan, yet nevertheless says there is a possibility of difficulty with that Empire in the near future, and therefore we ought to be prepared to meet such emergency should it arise.

I do not question the sincerity of the Senator's apprehension, but I will be permitted, and pardoned, I am sure, if I place more reliance upon what the Secretary of State says touching this matter, who, by virtue of his position, has superior opportunity to judge of the attitude and temper of foreign nations toward us. Secretary Root, whose diplomatic skill and genius adorn the great office of Secretary of State, speaking of this apprehension of difficulty with Japan, says:

> There was one great and serious question—

referring to the recent difficulty in California over the school question——

Mr. FORAKER. From what is the Senator reading?

Mr. BURROWS. From the American Journal of International Law, and from a speech of Secretary Root delivered before the Society of International Law, of which he is president.

> There was one great and serious question underlying the whole subject which made all questions of construction and of scope and effect of the treaty itself—all questions as to whether the claims of Japan were well founded or not; all questions as to whether the resolutions of the school board was valid or not—seem temporary and comparatively unimportant. It was not a question of war with Japan. All the foolish talk about war was purely sensational and imaginative. There was never even friction between the two Governments. The question was, What state of feeling would be created between the great body of the people of the United States and the great body of the people of Japan as a result of the treatment given to the Japanese in this country?
> What was to be the effect upon that proud, sensitive, highly civilized people across the Pacific, of the discourtesy, insult, imputations of inferiority and abuse aimed at them in the columns of American newspapers, and from the platforms of American public meetings? What would be the effect upon our own people of the responses that natural resentment for such treatment would elicit from the Japanese?
> The first article of the first treaty Japan ever made with a western power provided:
> "There shall be a perfect, permanent, and universal peace and a sincere and cordial amity between the United States of America on the one part and the Empire of Japan on the other part, and between their people respectively, without exception of persons or places."

Continuing, the Secretary says:

> Under that treaty, which bore the signature of Matthew Calbraith Perry, we introduced Japan to the world of western civilization. We had always been proud of her wonderful development—proud of the genius of the race that in a single generation adapted an ancient feudal system of the Far East to the most advanced standards of modern Europe and America. The friendship between the two nations had been peculiar and close. Was the declaration of that treaty to be set aside? At Kurihama, in Japan, stands a monument to Commodore Perry, raised by the Japanese in grateful appreciation, upon the site where he landed and opened negotiations for the treaty. Was that monument henceforth to represent dislike and resentment? Were the two peoples to face each other across the Pacific in future years with angry and resentful feelings?
> The great question which overshadowed all discussion of the treaty of 1894 was the question: Are the people of the United States about to break friendship with the people of Japan? That question, I believe, has been happily answered in the negative.

How idle is this talk of war with Japan in the light of these declarations of Secretary Root!

Mr. President, we would do well, too, to remember in the midst of this cry of war that this is an era of peace; an era of international parliaments seeking to devise means to settle international differences through the peaceful instrumentality of arbitration.

Let me quote the words of another great Secretary of State, Richard Olney, deploring the spirit of the times—the spirit of militarism which seems to have taken possession of some people—and invoking the higher and more humane spirit of arbitration, more in harmony with the spirit of advancing civilization of the age.

Speaking of the potency of this influence, ex-Secretary of State Olney says:

> In favor of all wise and just rules of international conduct formulated by conferences at The Hague or by other like conferences, the public opinion of the civilized world may be relied upon to furnish a force ever growing more and more potent, until such rules receive complete international recognition and acceptance. When, in 1823, Webster would have had this country express sympathy with the revolt of the Greeks against Turkey, and it was objected that the thing was useless, because we did not propose to fight for Greece or to endanger our own peace in any way, he made an answer which is among the most impressive of his public utterances:
> Sir, this reasoning mistakes the age. The time has been indeed when fleets and armies and subsidies were the principal reliances, even in the best cause. But, happily for mankind, a great change has taken place in this respect. Moral causes come into consideration in proportion as the progress of knowledge is advanced, and the public opinion of the civilized world is rapidly gaining an ascendency over mere brutal force. It is already able to oppose the most formidable obstruction to the progress of injustice and oppression, and as it grows more intelligent and more intense it will be more and more formidable. It may be silenced by military power, but it can not be conquered. It is elastic, irrepressible, and invulnerable to the weapons of ordinary warfare. It is that impassible, inextinguishable enemy of mere violence and arbitrary rule which, like Milton's angels,
> Vital in every part,
> Can not but by annihilating die.

This exalted sentiment, expressed by Mr. Webster more than three-quarters of a century ago, is peculiarly applicable to the times in which we live. "Though dead, he yet speaketh."

Secretary Olney further said:

> The Hague conference of 1899 did much in that direction by facilitating international arbitration and making mediation between angry states rather a friendly courtesy than a piece of officious impertinence. Other like conferences may be expected to make substantial progress in the same direction, and the advent of the time when "Nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more," is by no means to be put down as among the dreams of poets or the visions of seers. The interdependent relations of states, constantly increasing in number and closeness and strength, are constantly making war increasingly difficult, impracticable, and repulsive. They are steadily bringing nearer and making more imperative agreements between the civilized states of the world, by which war, already branded as the worst possible violation of the dictates of common sense and sound morals, shall also be a crime in the sight of international law, and as such be both preventable and punishable by all the forces which organized civilization may be able to command.

I ask permission of the Senate to insert in my remarks, without reading, some excerpts from an article appearing in the last issue of a magazine called "The Navy," justifying the course of the committee in reporting the authorization of but two battle ships instead of four. The reasons are so cogent as to command attention.

The article is entitled "The battle-ship programme," from which I quote:

> It seems not wholly unfortunate that the House Naval Committee has reported a bill providing for only two battle ships instead of the four asked for by the Department. Undoubtedly the naval requirements of this country demand the very early addition of four battle ships of the Dreadnought type; but it is probable that the best interests of our fleet will be served by authorizing only two this year.
>
> Several considerations have to be borne in mind in regard to this matter. In the first place, four ships authorized now would in all probability be mere repetitions of the Delaware and North Dakota. The designs of these two ships, especially in regard to turret arrangements—which materially affect the interior structure of the ship—were not finally settled until well into last November. And there appears no reason to believe that the Board of Construction has devised or contemplates any improvement on these ships.
> One of these ships, moreover, is herself an experiment. The North Dakota, fitted with Curtis turbine engines, is an entirely new venture for our Navy; and there is no means of knowing until after she is afloat and has had her trials, what modifications in her design may be necessary. Like the English Dreadnought, she is in a sense our big experimental ship; and until we know what she will do, and whether her designs need changing in order to make her efficient, it is certainly prudent not to duplicate her. It is at least possible that she may not behave well in squadron with ships of the same size driven by reciprocating engines. On the other hand, if the North Dakota proves to have the superiorities over ships with reciprocating engines that are to be hoped for, our future big ships should be turbine driven.

Some lessons may have to be learned also from foreign ships. The newly launched German Nassau, in particular, is one whose design our constructors need to pay attention. The number of guns she will carry and their arrangement appear to be so far a complete secret, outside the German officials. Our Berlin correspondent, whom we have reason to trust, says she will carry sixteen 11-inch guns, in an arrangement which he has roughly described. But it is apparent, from the tone of British service journals, that the armament of the new ship is not known in England. This ignorance of the details of the Nassau may, in fact, account, more than considerations of economy, for the decision of the British Admiralty to lay down no more than one Dreadnought this year. It will be seen, therefore, that neither as to our own Dreadnoughts, nor the newest ships of that type abroad, have we such knowedge as is desirable before entering upon a construction of a group of four new ships. Two more Delawares would give us a squadron of four ships of the same size; and, in the present uncertainties regarding this type, that is perhaps as far as it is prudent to go now.

The delay that would be occasioned by waiting for the trials of the North Dakota and Delaware could be compensated for in two ways. The contractors could undoubtedly be helped to finish them in considerably less than the contract period; and as to future big ships, a proper management of preparation should enable us to complete them in two years, instead of in the four or five now required. Measures could be so taken that the delay of any additional big ship for two years would leave us just as well off four years from now as there is any likelihood of our being if four ships are authorized this year and built under the prevailing system; with the added advantage that we should have "improved" Dreadnoughts—a thing not apparently probable now.

More than this, there is urgent need, before entering upon extensive construction, of adopting a definite naval programme extending over a series of years and planned with reference to the programme of other nations. We should decide upon a certain size of fleet, made up of certain kinds of ships, and work consistently and steadily toward getting it. So far we have "muddled along," doing too much one year and not enough the next, and doing it inconsistently, with such a result, for instance, as the launching this year of two battle ships, the Idaho and Mississippi, that are woefully out of date. It is to be hoped that the awakened interest in the Navy all over the country will support Congress and the Department in the adoption of a well-arranged and definite quantity of naval construction.

These reasons, I submit, are sufficiently cogent to command attention if they do not convince.

But it is contended that we must follow the lead of other nations; that England is building a great navy; Germany is increasing hers; and it is important that we should keep pace in our sea armanent with the naval powers of the world. I have in my hand a pamphlet which answers this contention so well that I venture to read an extract from an address delivered by Doctor Jefferson, an eminent divine of the city of New York. He says:

2. But if these four nations—

Speaking of England, Germany, France, and Japan—have great navies, we must follow their example. We can not afford not to do what they do. So men say; but why not? We are not like them. Their situation is different from ours. They have enemies, hereditary enemies; we have not. Everybody says we have not. President Roosevelt says so. All our statesmen say so. All the statesmen of all the other countries say so. Moreover, these four nations are our special friends. We are coming closer all the while to England. Germany and America have never been such good friends as now. France and our Republic have always gone hand in hand. Nobody outside of a pack of mischief-makers has ever dreamed that Japan has any feeling toward us but one of good will. We never have been entangled by the international complications of the wild and rude centuries that are gone. Why should we follow the example of nations who became embroiled centuries ago? Why should we squander our money in adopting a fashion which is not needed here, and which is so ruinous that the wisest hearts and heads of the Old World have groaned under it with an agony that is unspeakable?

* * * * * * *

But it is said:

4. "We have colonial possessions and we must protect them. How can you protect them if you do not gather them under the steel wings of a fleet of battle ships?" So men ask. But this terror is born of a disordered mind. When men become infected with the poison of militarism they have many of the symptoms of a man in delirium tremens. The world becomes filled with snakes, day and night are crowded with horrors, the universe is a hateful, hostile, hissing thing, and every moment gives birth to a new peril.

But it has been said in course of this debate that we must build a larger navy in order to insure peace with the world; that the way to keep the peace is to impress the nations of the earth that we are mighty and invincible in war. The distinguished Secretary of State in his recent unostentatious visit to the South American countries did more on that one journey in the interest of peace than could have been accomplished by the marshaling of all the battle ships we could command.

Doctor Jefferson comments upon this folly as follows:

5. "To keep the peace we must prepare for war." Some one said that long ago, and men have repeated it as though it were a word from the mouth of God. Its hollowness is evident to anyone who will look into it. The fact is that to keep the peace we must prepare for peace. If you want war, then prepare for war, multiply your guns, burnish them and make them shine, practice with them, keep the air filled with the reverberations of the roar of cannon. Swing your fleet from one ocean to another just when hearts are most irritated. Fill your newspapers with accounts of what your ships are doing, crowd your magazines with pictures of torpedo boats and destroyers. Set all the young men of the country thinking and talking about war, and then some day war will come. It is inevitable. If a nation does not want to fight it must put up its sword. It is amazing that there is an intelligent man on the earth who can not see this.

But it is said we need a larger navy in order to defend the Monroe doctrine. May I ask to have read a communication from Hon. John W. Foster, that accomplished diplomat and Christian statesman, in reply to the statement that our Monroe doctrine is no stronger than our Navy.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

EDITOR POST: Secretary Taft is reported, in your issue of this morning, to have declared, in a public address at Louisville, that "the principle of the Monroe doctrine is just as strong as our Navy and Army, and no stronger."

A greater fallacy never was uttered by an intelligent statesman. Our history plainly proves the contrary. The two most important occasions when the principle, or doctrine, was asserted aggressively by our Government was by President Monroe, in 1823, and by President Cleveland, in 1895. The "Holy Alliance," against whose aggressions the doctrine was asserted by President Monroe, had navies and armies which, either separately or combined, very greatly exceeded those of the United States. And the same may be said respecting the relative navy and army of Great Britain and the United States when President Cleveland uttered his warning.

I thank God there is a greater power in the world to-day than navies and armies. It is the moral sentiment of mankind. If the Monroe doctrine was not founded on sound policy and justice, with all our great resources we could not build a navy or organize an army large enough to maintain it.

JOHN W. FOSTER.

WASHINGTON, April 11.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator object to an interruption?

Mr. BURROWS. I prefer to finish, as I understand the Senator is going to close the debate, and can then make reply.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. There was not any debate except one speech to-day. Of course it is necessary for me to say something in reply.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will not ask the Senator to yield, but I shall want to refer to the speech made by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, it is said that this increase in our naval armament is demanded by the people. The last authoritative expression of opinion by the people upon this subject comes from the popular branch of Congress, which, elected by the people, speaks for the people; and that voice is against the building of four battle ships by a recorded vote of 199 to 83. That is the latest and most authoritative expression of the will of the people, and I have no hesitancy myself in following that expression of the public will and agreeing with the House of Representatives in the construction of only two battle ships.

The spirit of this age, Mr. President, the dominating thought of this country, is the spirit and thought of arbitration, of peace and not war; and that spirit permeating the Christian people of this country to-day as never before is only marred by the discordant notes of war heard in the halls of the American Congress.

Let us hope, Mr. President, that the time is near at hand, nay, already here, when the people of the United States and the civilized nations of the world "shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks; when nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I can not help but feel that Congress itself has a duty to perform in the great subject that is before us to-day. I can not help also but feel that the framers of the Constitution, when they separated the great powers of this Government and set the line of demarcation between the exercise of those powers, intended that Congress should exercise its judgment, and that the vote of Congress should be the consensus of the opinion of all the members of both bodies.

I have not changed my conviction upon that proposition in all the argument that has been made before us upon this great, this most important question. Congress has its duties to perform. Congress receives all the information that it can from each of the great Executive Departments, digests that information, measures its ability to comply with the request of each of those Departments, and in the end it generally does what is right and just for the American people.

Under the system that is in vogue to-day each Department reports to the President the requirements of that Department for the ensuing year. The President communicates that information to us in the messages which we receive at the beginning of every session. Then Congress takes account of the expenses and the income of the Government, and if it acts justly and in accordance with the will of the country, it makes every possible attempt to keep its expenses within its income, and so apportion the outlays for the demands of government as will meet the necessities of each Department as near as it is possible to do so. I am somewhat surprised that in all the argument for the additional enormous outlay for battle ships not one word has been said as to where we are to get the money to pay for them. Are we to borrow the money or come back here in a few months and vote a deficiency bill carrying some $80,000,000?

We know as a matter of fact, Mr. President, that if we followed absolutely the recommendation of each of the great Executive Departments of the Government for what the Department thought was proper to be appropriated for its purpose, we would bankrupt the Government in a single year. So we are compelled to prune down here and there until we have brought the expenses as near as possible to our idea of what the future will bring of money for our use. That is the business proposition that is presented to us to-day.

I know that there are many people of the press and I know that there are many other people in the United States who are actuated more or less by the love of power, which permeates every individual to a certain extent, who will always be in favor of building up the Army and of increasing the Navy to any extent, and no matter what the extent of any proposed addition it will always be popular with a large number of people.

But, Mr. President, those same people who are guided and controlled by their impulses in matters of this kind are always the very first ones to open their batteries of condemnation upon Congress if at the end of a fiscal year it is compelled to borrow money in "piping times of peace" to carry on the Government of the United States. So I insist that as a business proposition we should keep our expenses as near as possible within our income for the ensuing year.

Mr. President, I believe that there is not a single Senator in this body nor a single Member of Congress who is not in favor of maintaining a good, strong Navy, and of building it up as rapidly as the conditions of our income will warrant, taking into consideration the demands along every other line.

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SCOTT] but a few days ago made a most eloquent plea for a greater number of public buildings. The plea which he made to the Senate was one all must admit to be correct and proper. We were forced to the conclusion that we have not sufficient public buildings in the United States to properly conduct the business of the country. We were forced to the conclusion that we are paying three or four times the amount that we ought to pay for the rental of buildings in which to conduct our business. And yet we are compelled in order to keep within our income to forego the construction of these buildings that are so necessary.

Again, the whole West and Northwest, desiring to build up their country, are appealing to us to appropriate a greater sum of money for soil surveys. The people of that section wish to present their claims not only to the old countries, but to this country, by showing the soil in a particular locality and demonstrating that it is a place to come to to make American homes. The Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was compelled to cut that appropriation down, because they say we have not sufficient income to meet that demand.

In considering the question of whether we should provide for two or three or four battle ships this year, I can not idly lay aside the conclusion, and, considering its importance, I must believe the careful conclusions of the Committee on Naval Affairs of this body. I know that every question pro and con has been carefully considered, and I can not but feel that if they believed that the immediate demand for four instead of two battle ships for this year was so imperative as to justify overdrawing our income some $20,000,000 for that item alone, it would have been so recommended. Nor can I lose sight of the fact that the other House of Congress, after having also carefully considered the matter, by a vote of nearly three to one, spoke its judgment in favor of two battle ships this year.

Mr. President, I listened with a great deal of interest to the illogical logic—what I consider very one-sided logic—about this necessity of preparing for war in order that we may keep the peace of the country. That proposition, old as it may be as a plea to the public to build up the armaments of each of the great military establishments of the world, in my opinion has no foundation on which it can possibly stand.

The rule is exactly the opposite of this. If it were possible that we could conceive of every nation being about as powerful as every other nation and supplant that with the conception that each one of these nations is desirous of despoiling the other, then the rule would be applicable; each would be compelled to arm itself equal to its watchful antagonist. But inasmuch as that condition can never be, the rule can seldom be applied to conditions as we find them.

Mr. President, let us look into this proposition for a moment. Let us take the countries of Europe and see whether the rule applies there. Germany has a vast standing army. She is always prepared for war upon the land. Has that vast standing army been to Europe an assurance of peace, or is it a condition that is always inclined to lead her into war?

Everyone who reads the press of the country and the press of the world knows that it takes the combined diplomacy of all Europe to prevent a conflict, ever imminent, because of her preparedness for war. Let us carry our minds back two or three years to the Moroccan occasion, to the dispute between Germany and France. Germany was ready, ready at a moment's notice, to strike at her old enemy. It was the influence of the world and the diplomacy of the world that maintained peace at that time; maintained it not because Germany was prepared, but despite that preparation.

So we can follow history from its beginning down to the present time, and I say that instead of the rule being that preparedness for war is a prevention of war we are forced to the opposite conclusion.

Mr. President, we of the Caucasian race have always the spirit of warfare and of aggression in our hearts. We never can eliminate it. It is absolutely true and undeniable that the great Caucasian race has fought more wars of aggression, and, we are compelled to admit, more wars of injustice, ten times over, than all the rest of the world.

But I want to show that the question whether preparedness for war is a guaranty for peace depends entirely upon conditions outside of this preparedness. Little Switzerland has been able to live independently for a great many years. Norway, in its merchant marine, being about the third or fourth country in the world to-day, has no great battle ships to repel a German attack, and yet her situation and the condition of her environments in Europe are such as to insure her independence as against an aggressive nation. If there is a universal rule that the peace of a nation is dependent upon its being able to match its army or navy with each other power, how is it that these little kingdoms of Europe still continue to live happily and peacefully, freed from the burdens of supporting vast armies and navies?

Italy can not to-day compete with Germany or any of the great powers in Europe with her navy, and yet she is absolutely protected against aggression from other countries. That is true, Mr. President, of all of the countries of Europe, but about four.

Now, let us glance for a moment to our own conditions and environments. The Senator from Indiana says we should approach this subject from a business standpoint—I want to comply with his suggestion. A competent general not only takes cognizance of the strength and weaknesses of his own army and how it is surrounded and protected, but he also looks at the condition of the enemy and determines therefrom whether he will be the one who shall make the attack or whether it will be the enemy that will be liable to make it. When we look at our condition and situation as regards the rest of the world, we are forced to the conclusion that we are so situated that we can determine the time when we shall have war with any other nation upon the face of the earth, unless we, through a sensational and lurid press, are inclined to flaunt our superiority of arms and power in the face of nations that must fight in order to sustain their own honor.

Mr. President, every argument that I have heard in favor of the building of four war ships is just as good an argument in favor of building ten war ships. Not one sentence which has been uttered here has given the foundation for the argument that we must have four war ships, which does not apply with equal force to the theory that we must have ten or more war ships.

I am not insensible to the argument, that if actual war should at any time be thrust upon us, we should regret that we had not these two extra battle ships. Yes, and we should also regret that we did not have ten more instead of two. No nation ever entered into a war that did not regret that it did not have greater strength and more war material. These two extra ships could not stave off war that is imminent, because they could not be completed within three or four years.

I should like to disillusion the mind of my friend from Washington [Mr. PILES] of the idea that the specter of war is hanging over the Pacific Ocean, and that it is liable to come down like a cyclone upon that section of the country at any time.

When two great nations determine that they must resort to the arbitrament of arms in order to settle a dispute, they will generally consider what that arbitrament of arms will mean to them. That final result of appeal to arms is just what every country in the world must and will take into consideration. There is no Senator here who will not agree with me that the nation that will be successful in war will not only be the nation that has got the men, but the nation that has got the money and resources back of it in order to conduct a war.

In the late war between Japan and Russia, the little Empire of Japan was compelled to borrow of every country in Europe, and in the United States, and to sell her bonds bearing 6 per cent interest for a little over 90 cents on the dollar at the time. That was when she was fighting for her very life, and fighting right at home, upon her own borders, and figliting a battle of defense against an enormous power, which meant either that she must be victorious or must forever sink to the level of a fifth or sixth class power. She was compelled, under those conditions, to draw upon every one of the banks of Europe. What would be the condition of that little nation across the ocean, with only about one-half the population of the United States, with only one five-hundredth of the territory of the United States, with less than one one-hundredth of the income of the United States—what would be her position in the financial world if she attempted to borrow money to conduct a war against this mighty nation? She could not get a dollar in all Europe; and not having a dollar at home to-day, being loaded with a debt that must hang heavily upon the shoulders of her people for many years, she would not venture into an aggressive war against such a powerful nation as this. That we might force her into it to maintain her own honor is barely possible, but very improbable.

Nor is that the only reason. I agreed with the Senator from Indiana when he wrote so optimistically of The Russian Advance, and I will agree with him that that mighty power has only been checked. I do not believe any nation in the world understands that any better than the little kingdom of the Mikado; and the moment that nation should engage in a bloody war with such a powerful opponent as this the Russian bear would again be upon its haunches, and with its iron claws would destroy the little empire and regain Manchuria before it could turn from one giant antagonist to the other. So I am not afraid of an aggressive warfare from that side of the ocean.

Let us see, then, where else war is to come from. The next and greatest naval power in the world is Great Britain. Will she ever attack the United States? Great Britain with her immense navy is the most peacefully inclined country in the world to-day. Why? Not because she has such power, but because she knows what war will mean to her. She knows that while the sun never sets upon the British Empire, the sun must also never set upon the war ships that must be kept where Britain's colony is located. So while a mighty country like this would not be vulnerable from any point, the great Empire of Great Britain is vulnerable at a thousand points at one time. Her situation, her environments, and her scattered colonies on which she is dependent for food for her millions renders a great navy indispensable to her safety. But not being situated as is Great Britain there is no reason on earth why we should take the British navy as a standard by which we should build up our own.

In addition to this, the hostage for peace between this country and Great Britain lies to the north of us. I speak of these things to show how impossible war is with this great country, whose immense shore lines are on two oceans, with our power and our ability to raise an army for defense and to maintain an army of any necessary size and to continue building battle ships all of the time to answer the demands of a gradual and proper growth.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. McCUMBER. Always.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from North Dakota has just said in his closing utterance that war was impossible; which I hope is right. If war, then, is impossible——

Mr. McCUMBER. I will not say "impossible." I will modify it, if I used the word "impossible," and say "almost impossible—improbable."

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Well, that of course is different. "Almost improbable" is different from "utterly impossible." The only question, then, that I was going to ask—but I will not ask it now—if the Senator thinks it is absolutely impossible, or, as he stated, "utterly impossible," does he not think it is a wrong policy for us to pursue to build any navy at all?

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no; Mr. President, not by any means. War is always possible; but if we are to build a navy upon the possibilities and not upon the probabilities of war, then our Navy should be as great as all of the navies of the world combined. No nation on earth will or could pursue that policy.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Just a moment. Great Britain is compelled to maintain a navy double that of any other country in the world, because she is subject to attack at more than double the number of places of any other nation in the world, and must necessarily distribute her forces. With a little island only about half as large as the State in which I live, in which she must care for more than 50,000,000 people, it is necessary for her to have egress and ingress to all the markets of the world, and it is necessary for her to have a navy that will keep them open for her. We have enough to live on for a hundred years at least in our own country without calling upon the outside world for one dollar's worth of material, and during all that time, safe in our mighty realm, we could be striking at any other nation in the world. That is why we have the guaranty of peace.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I stated when I arose that I intended to ask the Senator a question, but I shall not now ask it. I will, however, ask a question in view of the Senator's last remark. I remember that no plea more eloquent and informing has been made in this Chamber or in public life for foreign trade than that of the Senator as to the absolute necessity of our having foreign trade, and although now the exigencies of debate make the Senator say that we could live for a hundred years absolutely disconnected from the outside world—of course we could, I think, for a thousand—but now the question I was going to ask is this: The Senator modified his statement of war being utterly impossible—with which I wish I could agree—to "almost improbable."

Mr. McCUMBER. I will put it "improbable," leaving out the word "almost."

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Well, "improbable." That is a very distinct limitation. Now, then, upon that no one contends that the Navy should be as large as all other navies of the world combined, because we could not possibly—that is an impossibility—get into war with all nations combined.

Mr. McCUMBER. Not impossible——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes; with all nations combined.

Mr. McCUMBER. But very improbable.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. With all nations combined, impossible. Now, it being true that it is improbable—that is, it may be or it may not be—ought we not to have a navy adequate to immediately act in case the improbability became the fact?

Mr. McCUMBER. That is what we are doing, Mr. President. That is just exactly what we have done to-day. I am speaking of that improbability, and saying that we are prepared for the improbabilities, and for the great improbabilities. It has been admitted again and again, and I think that it is without any doubt, that we are the second great naval power in the world to-day, vessel for vessel and gun for gun. That is our present situation, and if I am to vote to increase the Navy beyond that necessity, I must see what the danger is that will necessitate a greater navy than that.

The only power in the world having a greater navy is Great Britain. That greater navy in all probability would not be used against this country, because the final result must necessarily be disastrous to a country that must depend wholly upon her international trade. She is subject to weaknesses to which we are not subject. So we will eliminate the British Empire from the field of war probability.

Then, I come next, after having eliminated Japan and Great Britain, to the probability of a war with Germany. The only thing that has ever been stated by our press—and I disagree with it on that—is that the great German Empire has had an eye upon South America, and would, therefore, wish to break in upon our Monroe doctrine.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. May I ask the Senator a question right there?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think perhaps the Senator's recollection will be much more vivid than my own. I do not see here the Senator to whom I am going to refer, but was not a speech made upon this floor by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], whose learning all of us admit and admire, upon the acute probability of difficulty with Germany about South America some three or four years ago, during our mutual incumbency of seats in this body?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think any Senator has ever gone to the extent of presupposing that any acute question would arise upon a breach of the Monroe doctrine.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I may be wrong about that, but I think not. The Senator may remember about it. I shall look it up almost immediately.

Mr. McCUMBER. A serious question, if I may call it serious, and yet one that could easily be diplomatically settled, was the question whether foreign powers should bring their war ships across the ocean to enforce private contracts in the South American Republics. That matter has been settled. It went to The Hague. Such questions will always go to some arbitrating of that character rather than to the arbitrament of war. But I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that we have maintained the Monroe doctrine during all these years when we had practically no navy. If we have maintained it without any navy in all the past years, what reason have we to assume that now it must necessarily take a navy greater than that of any country except Great Britain in order to maintain that doctrine?

Mr. President, there have been in the past promises, almost, on the part of the Committee on Naval Affairs. After we had appropriated large sums for these great war ships we have been assured almost positively that the policy would be to build one war ship each year. We have done that and more than that. The President of the United States has concurred in the action of the two committées of Congress upon that subject. Suddenly it comes from somewhere—I assume first from the Navy Department and then through the President—that we ought to provide this year for four instead of one battle ship. In this bill the committee has gone half way and provided for two, and the only question that is before us to-day is whether we shall have two this year and two next year, or whether we shall have four this year and possibly none next year.

Mr. HALE. Or four more.

Mr. McCUMBER. Or posibly four more next year. If what has been stated by the Senator from Indiana, as I understood the purport of his address, and by the Senator from Washington has anything more than vivid imagination for its foundation, then this whole subject ought to have been considered in secret session and not publicly. The very fact that we have not seen fit to close these doors is evidence to my mind that no Senator has any grounds to urge upon this Senate why we are in such imminent danger from these great powers that it is necessary for us to go outside of what we had determined to do and to double the number of battle ships in this particular year.

But few of the people who are always clamoring for this immense show of power have ever fully realized what it costs the American people. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs ever since I have been in the Senate has given us year after year a solemn warning of what we were coming to in this respect. He informed us, or some one did only a few days ago in debate, that we are to-day paying more than 70 per cent of all the income of the United States for matters pertaining to past wars and for preparing for future wars. If the policy of the War Department and the policy of the Navy Department should govern us in our deliberations, in less than ten years we will be paying out 90 per cent of all the income of the United States for war purposes alone.

Mr. President, I have before me a statement, which I cut from one of the great New York papers, entitled "What the biggest battle ship means in money," and I ask that the Secretary read it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

WHAT THE BIGGEST BATTLE SHIP MEANS IN MONEY.

The North Dakota, when completed and ready to go into commission, will represent an initial outlay of $10,000,000.

Nearly $1,000,000 of this will be spent for guns alone. There are ten 12-inch guns, at $65,000 each, and fourteen 5-inch rifles, at $10,000 each, in the main battery, besides twelve rapid-fire guns and minor pieces.

To fire one broadside from the main battery will cost $17,000, exclusive of cost of maintaining gunners. One shot from each 12-inch gun will cost $1,160, and from each 5-inch gun $430.

One broadside from the main battery means the firing of 10,000 pounds of steel shot. This is 3,000 more pounds of projectiles than Dewey's whole fleet could fire at the battle of Manila.

To fire one shot from each 12-inch gun will require 250 pounds of powder, at 80 cents a pound. Each projectile for the 12-inch guns weighs 850 pounds and costs $310, making a total cost of $510 for each shot. To this must be added an allowance of $650 for deterioration in the gun, as the 12-inch firing piece is practically unfit for further use after being fired 100 times.

The cost of keeping the North Dakota in commission and in first-class fighting trim will be $1,000,000 per annum. This includes the feeding and paying of her crew of 900 officers and men, ordinary repairs, machinery, and other ship supplies and coaling.

Mr. McCUMBER. These figures, Mr. President, are most astounding. Few of us are capable of comprehending what an immense fleet's daily or weekly gun practice means in money that is absolutely burned up. Every shot from a 12-inch gun means $1,160 blown out of existence. Every broadside from the North Dakota means $17,500 furnished by the taxpayers of the American nation. Take all of your vessels, with their constant practice, and then you will be able at least to comprehend in some slight degree the enormous expense of maintaining an efficient navy. This ought to cause us to halt for a moment to see what it means—the curtailing of appropriations for the thousands of things we ought to have for our internal needs. I, Mr. President, can understand why Great Britain, Germany, and even little Italy, should strain every nerve in order to keep up their vast armaments; but when I travel into one of those countries and see their mighty marine power on the one hand, with the gold braid and the gold rope, the pomp and the power, and all that it signifies to the world, and then look upon the pinched and starved faces of the millions upon millions who are being taxed to death for the very purpose of maintaining those mighty armaments, my whole heart and soul go out for peace. When I feel that this country, above all other countries in the world, is so situated that she can at all times use her mighty power and influence for peace, then I hate to see her, one of the great powers, go into competition with and compel all of the great powers of Europe to bring their citizens down to the verge of starvation in order to match the great American vessels. We should speak for peace, and, in my candid opinion, our voice should ever be for the purpose of disarmament rather than for the purpose of armament.

Mr. President, it has been stated by the Senator from Indiana that if at the time of our war with Spain either our country or Spain had had more war ships we might have had peace instead of a resort to arms. We determined when we wanted to go to war with Spain. We knew that we had the power to crush her at any moment's notice. We did not need but twenty-four hours' notice.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. McCUMBER. It is possible that if we had not been so well armed we would not have hurried quite so much. It is possible that if the great nations of Europe were not so well prepared for war they would use diplomacy for a longer time and that diplomacy in the end would win. So this theory that being prepared for war brings peace is certainly as broad as it is long, and, in my opinion, it is broader.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the Senator will permit me——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator says that we knew we could crush Spain. The trouble is, as I pointed out, that our preponderance was not such that Spain knew that same fact. Had our preponderance been that great, I think most of those who have studied the question agree that Spain and ourselves would have settled the difficulty by diplomatic processes.

Now, I wish to ask the Senator a question. He said that we knew that war with Spain was coming. How many persons knew that war with Spain was coming three months before it did occur? None of the veteran Senators here thought so.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator is mistaken. I do not say that this country knew that war was coming with Spain.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think the Senator will find it in the RECORD.

Mr. McCUMBER. I may find it in the RECORD in some one's else address, but certainly it is not in the RECORD in my address.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think it will be found in the Senator's remarks.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; Mr. President. The proposition I make is that with a weaker power we are always able to go to war at once if we are prepared, whereas if we are not so well prepared we often settle by diplomacy what would otherwise have to be settled by the sword. The Senator from Indiana knows as well as I know that the man who goes armed is always the man who does the shooting in self-defense; that the man who knows that he is ready for an encounter is always the man who finds some excuse to get into that encounter; and what is true of the individual is equally true of great nations. There is not a powerful nation in Europe to-day capable of taking territory from another power that, by reason of her vast preponderance of power, is not anxious and ever seeking a pretext to extend her domain.

So, Mr. President, I can hardly understand the necessity for this feverish activity to suddenly add four more battle ships to our Navy. We can not even wait to build colliers to supply them, but we are compelled to go into the open market for them. It would be considered the height of folly if we were to say that we should build ships and provide guns and yet have no ammunition with which to fire them.

But that is no more of a folly than the idea that we can go to war and can supply the men for these great ships until we have built up our merchant marine. We may take young men to-day and put them directly into the Navy, but whenever with that Navy we get into a war with any great power we will have to double the number of men immediately, and where are you going to get them? You can not get them, if they are to be any good, unless they are seamen. You can not have seamen unless you build up your merchant marine. And so side by side with the gradual development of our Navy should be the gradual development of our merchant marine, to furnish the men for the Navy. And yet we are doing nothing along that line.

Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], with a great deal of vehemence, almost tragically intimated that his vote upon this subject would be governed by what foreign countries did not want him to do; and in a sentence with a dash between each word as long as a crowbar he said: "How would any foreign country want you to vote on this question?" I can answer him, "How would the steel company have us vote on a question of ten ships?" I will not be governed by the foreign idea of what we ought to do, nor will I be governed by what the steel trust would like to have us do. But I shall be governed by what I feel we ought to do in the gradual and proper building up of a great navy.

Mr. President, we are second in naval power to-day. There is not any question in my mind that in a few years we will be first, and what have I to base that assumption upon? I tell you, Senators, that the ability of these foreign countries to maintain navies of the kind they are building now has about reached a limit. They all understand that they have not the resources to continue that development and growth indefinitely. We can go on year in and year out and put out two or three or a greater number of battle ships, if it is necessary, to add to our Navy.

There is not to-day any country in Europe whose budget does not show a greater expense every year and comparatively less income to meet that expense and whose national debt is not being increased every year in order to meet the great demands upon it. There will be a limit on the other side of the ocean, and long after they have reached their limit we will be developing and increasing our Navy to a higher and higher standard of power and effectiveness. So I believe, Mr. President, that the best policy is for us to keep on developing our Navy, not too hastily, and to keep somewhere within our income. If we were to construct four this year, they would probably each be of the Dreadnought class. Who can say that next year we might not change our plans about effectiveness and with the same money build two or three times the number of a smaller type?

I did not really relish what I think the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] did not purposely intend to convey and yet which was conveyed to me, that every man who could not agree with the Commander in Chief upon how many ships we should build in a year was necessarily hostile to him and his policies. I do not believe there is a Senator here who is more closely attached to those great policies of the President of the United States in reference to the economic conditions in this country and the opening up and keeping open of the field of opportunity to every man, woman, and child on the American continent than I am. But that does not mean that in order to agree with him upon these great policies I must surrender my individual judgment upon just what should be done in every particular case, as to whether we should build two battle ships this year and two next, or whether we should build four this year and none next, or just how we should apportion our income to meet the thousands of governmental necessities.

So I do not believe it is proper, at least from my standpoint, to assume that anyone speaking against the consumption of nearly all our resources for the purpose of building up the Navy is hostile to the Administration generally or hostile to the wishes of the Department. I say I do not believe the Senator from Indiana intended it in that way, and yet it was conveyed to many of us in that sense. I always have stood by and ardently supported all the President's great economic reforms, because I feel that they are fundamentally and eternally right.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the Senator from North Dakota will pardon me——

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I have my remarks before me. I never made any such statement, and when the Senator comes to read my remarks, unchanged, he will find that the statement at the time it was made was absolutely free from any possible inference of that kind. I not only stated that any Senator who disagreed with the President upon the question of four battle ships was not hostile to his economic policies, but that he was not hostile to him even upon this policy. My reference, as the Senator will see when he comes to read it, was distinctly as to the weight which the Senate of the United States should give to what the President himself in his message called his solemn request of Congress to provide these ships.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am glad to have the Senator state what he has just stated. I think I attach as much importance to messages which come from the President of the United States as any other man in the Senate, but I can not but remember that only a very few months ago the President was in absolute accord with the committee of both Houses for one battle ship a year. We gave him the one; we gave him two; and if there was any reason given to the Senate why we should suddenly give four, I would support four, and if I was as fearful of war as some Senators who have expressed themselves upon this subject seem to be, I would vote for ten.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does not the Senator——

Mr. McCUMBER. I am through.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I merely wish to ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat. The Senator says "if any reason was given." Does not the Senator think that some reason was given in the President's special message, which we all have before us and which has been made public not only to this body, but to the world?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have heard of none, unless it is based upon the idea that as the other countries of the world are more rapidly increasing their navies we should do likewise.

Mr. HALE obtained the floor.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HALE. I want to say a word about the order of business——

Mr. STONE. Proceed.

Mr. HALE (continuing). In which the Senator is as much interested as I am.

Mr. President, the Senate has spent substantially a solid week of long days upon this one appropriation bill. It is met with the fact that there still remain untouched the agricultural appropriation bill, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill, the great sundry civil appropriation bill——

Mr. FRYE. The post-office appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. The post-office appropriation bill, and the general deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. WARREN. And the Military Academy bill.

Mr. HALE. And the Military Academy bill. The list is even larger and more formidable than I supposed.

Mr. WARREN. I may say that there are also conferences on nearly all of the other bills.

Mr. HALE. I was going to say that there are conferences on almost every one of the other bills which have been passed.

I think there is a general accord of sentiment that it is better, all things considered, that we have an early adjournment. I may be wrong about that, but I leave that suggestion to the minds and wishes of Senators. I think that is the feeling.

Now, we can not encompass an early adjournment unless we bring these appropriation bills speedily before the Senate and consider them and pass them and send them with the amendments to the other House and get them into conference and wind up that part of the business of the session.

That does not exclude the consideration of other appropriation bills, important bills, beside the regular appropriation bills—the omnibus claims bill, the public buildings appropriation bill and other important legislation affecting the business of the country that will come in at times when the appropriation bills do not preoccupy the floor.

I thought this was a fitting time—it is a sort of an old story—to bring this to the minds of Senators. I think it is fitting that we should over Sunday consider these things and see what we are going to do in the way of the business of the Senate.

As I have said, this bill, very important, but only one of the important bills, has occupied substantially a week. It is now half past 4 o'clock, the end of a laborious, wearisome week. I have a list, which has been given to the Presiding Officer, of those who desire to be heard on this bill. While for my own convenience, and I presume in accord with the wishes of a very large majority of the Senate, I should like to end this bill to-night, as I hoped to do last night and the night before, I see that that is practically impossible. I am not doing this in any way to exclude proper debate; we have had it for a week, and Senators have spoken and spoken well, intelligently, and they have stuck to the subject, with no wandering, but I am constrained to do now, what is always done when we meet a condition of this kind, see if we can not agree that this bill shall be disposed of. I do not suggest holding the Senate here until 6 or 7 o'clock and then perhaps finding that we can not pass it, which would be adding a needless burden and make it tiresome, but I ask unanimous consent that the bill and all amendments shall be voted on finally previous to the adjournment on Monday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the pending bill and all amendments——

Mr. HALE. All pending amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. And to be offered——

Mr. HALE. To be offered; that is well understood.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Be voted upon before the Senate adjourns on Monday next.

Mr. STONE. Certainly, Mr. President, I have not any objection to that arrangement. I am as anxious as the Senator from Maine can be, although he is in charge of this measure, to bring it to a speedy conclusion, very largely for the reasons he has stated.

The debate so far, however, has been almost wholly upon the other side of the Chamber. Only one Senator upon this side, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY], has spoken, and he briefly. I do not know how many Senators desire to speak on this bill. I should like on Monday morning to occupy a short while. I do not wish to prolong what I shall say to the discomfort of the Senate. I wish to discuss some phases of this measure, and particularly a collateral question that has been projected into it in the course of the debate. I do not wish to proceed to-night, at this late hour. I have not any doubt that by 5 or 6 o'clock Monday we will be able to conclude the debate. We certainly ought to be and get a vote upon the amendments and upon the bill and bring it to a conclusion.

Mr. HALE. For three days, each morning, Senators have said to me, "We shall settle this matter before night." The day has gone; the time has been consumed. Can we not agree now that a day shall be fixed when we will take a vote? I want every Senator who desires to discuss it. I agree I will not interfere. I will not be in the way, although I have charge of the bill. I desire, and I presume I should have the opportunity before a vote is taken, to close the debate upon the amendment, but I do not even expect to ask that privilege. I should feel safer if we could agree that a final vote shall be taken before adjournment on Monday. I do not want to limit it to 5 o'clock. We may stay here one day until 6 or 7.

Mr. STONE. I have not any objection to that suggestion. I wish simply to say, and the Senator from Maine and others will bear me out in saying, that I have not very often protracted the final disposition of measures before the Senate by useless discussion. I do not believe that any Senator who has indicated, so far as I know, a wish to be heard has any purpose of that kind in view. I am inclined to think that the suggestion of the Senator from Maine is well made, that we conclude this bill before adjournment on Monday.

Mr. HALE. Yes. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I wish to make one suggestion in connection with the proposed consent agreement, which is that after 3 o'clock or 4 o'clock on Monday we be limited to ten-minute speeches. There are a good many Senators here who would like, in a few words, to express why they intend to vote as they will vote, who will not have any chance unless there is some limitation of that kind. That will give everybody an opportunity to say something.

Mr. HALE. I did not think of that.

Mr. FORAKER. It is reasonable to make that request.

Mr. HALE. I have no idea that any Senator will object to it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Maine to the fact, which has been overlooked, that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] has given notice that he will continue his remarks on the Brownsville affair on Monday.

Mr. ALDRICH. That can go over.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. WARNER. I have given notice that I intended to proceed with my remarks on Monday, at the conclusion of the routine morning business, but I certainly would not insist upon proceeding at that time if an arrangement can be made to dispose of this important measure, assuming that I will be given the same privilege on Tuesday. I recognize the importance of this matter and adapt myself to conditions.

Mr. HALE. I think the Senate will be very much obliged to the Senator for his unselfishness in the matter.

Now, I think we can readily agree that we shall take a vote previous to adjournment on Monday, and that after 3 o'clock speeches shall be under the ten-minute rule.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am in heartiest accord with the desire of the Senator from Maine for an early vote upon this bill. I expected it would be taken last night, and not only for my own personal comfort, but for the desires of other Senators I should be only too glad to come to a vote, so far as I am concerned, at any moment.

The Senator from Maine has been very courteous and very kind, as he always is, with this bill; but I wish to point out one fact: This amendment, which after all is the important amendment, as some Senators think, on this bill—more important than all the other amendments—has not taken up very much time. Only one day and part of another day have been taken up. While I was out of the Chamber I understand the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] gave notice of his desire to speak on Monday. I understand from the Senator from Delaware that he desires to speak on Monday. I have understood that the Senator from Idaho desires to speak on Monday—how long, I do not know. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] has just indicated his desire to speak on Monday, and both Senators from Utah, I think, and several other Senators, I understand, wish to speak. I regret to say—and I regret it as much as the Senator from Maine—that it will be necessary for me, I think, to consume a little time myself in some further remarks, called forth by the debate to-day.

I think all of us concede that we can get to a vote on Monday, and I suggest that the usual courtesy be extended. None of the Senators want to prolong this matter a moment. Everybody wishes that it was out of the way. I suggest that we go along and try to get to a vote on Monday. I have no doubt in the world we will reach a vote before adjournment, but let us not make an agreement which would cut any Senator off from expressing his opinions upon this very important subject, which, in view of its importance, has not taken very long.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I am deeply interested in this subject, and I did intend to speak on the amendment, but I hope the Senator from Indiana will not insist on letting this matter go on. I want to vote on it Monday.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. So do I.

Mr. SMOOT. And so far as I am personally concerned, rather than not have an agreement at this time that we shall vote upon it on Monday, I would waive my right to speak at all.

Mr. HALE. Other Senators have said the same thing.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I shall be very glad to make such an agreement. I will say to the Senator from Maine, with this modification, that we meet at 12 o'clock——

Mr. HALE. Eleven o'clock.

Mr. ALDRICH. Eleven o'clock.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Whatever the hour may be. I see on the Senator's list seven or eight speakers. We know that those speeches can not be made before 3 o'clock. I think the original suggestion of the Senator from Maine would be the wiser one.

Mr. ALDRICH. Why not make it 4 o'clock instead of 3 o'clock.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Let us leave it to the good sense and the mutual consideration of Senators, and agree to what the Senator from Maine originally requested, that we dispose of the bill and all amendments before adjournment on Monday.

Mr. HALE. That is all right.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Very well. I hope the Senator will make that request.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish merely to make a suggestion.

Mr. HALE. I have had so much experience with these things that I think we will get an agreement by gentle, easy processes.

Mr. McCUMBER. I was going to suggest—and I think it would come better from me than from some one who has not spoken on this subject, for they might feel some delicacy on the point—that those of us who have spoken on this question shall be limited to ten minutes in any address upon Monday. That will give better opportunity to those who have not spoken to be heard.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is a good Senator and a great humorist. I have another suggestion to make, which will help out—that the Senate meet at 11 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. KEAN. Take a recess?

Mr. HALE. We can fix that.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is immaterial.

Mr. HALE. I can move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet at 11 o'clock on Monday next.

Mr. KEAN. Let us take a recess.

Mr. HALE. Or take a recess, which is better still, and that after 4 o'clock speeches be limited to ten minutes. I do not want to curtail Senators who may want to make longer speeches on this matter, but that will give five hours. We can do all the voting in an hour or an hour and a half, and can get away and get to our homes seasonably. I shall feel like a new man when I get this off my mind. Therefore I make that request, and I will follow it by asking unanimous consent that, as a part of the proposition, the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock Monday.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. Let me make a suggestion to the Senator. Instead of taking a recess until 11 o'clock Monday I suggest that the Senator move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet at 11 o'clock Monday. I do not like the suggestion of projecting Saturday's session into Monday by a recess, which shall likewise include Sunday.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The question of a recess or an adjournment is not very material.

Mr. HALE. I do not think it is very material. I now move——

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator from Maine withhold his motion until certain bills may be laid before the Senate?

Mr. HALE. Other business can be transacted after the agreement is made.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understood that the Senator was about to move a recess.

Mr. HALE. No; I am not. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet at 11 o'clock on Monday.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Now, I ask unanimous consent—meeting at 11, would not 3 o'clock give ample time?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Four.

Mr. HALE. Well, 4 o'clock. I ask that after 4 o'clock speeches shall be under the ten-minute rule——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think that is entirely fair.

Mr. HALE (continuing). And that the final vote shall be taken on all amendments and the bill before adjournment.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think that is entirely fair.

Mr. HALE. Yes; that is satisfactory to everybody.

Mr. CULBERSON. Of course it is understood that the time between 11 o'clock and 4 will be somewhat equitably divided between those who want to discuss favorably the amendment and those who are opposed to it. With that understanding I have no objection to the agreement.

Mr. HALE. We have never made any definite agreement, but have left all that to the Chair. I have no doubt that that will be properly cared for.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks as a part of the agreement that the bill be taken up immediately upon convening on Monday?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the consideration of the pending bill be resumed at 11 o'clock Monday next, that the debate proceed until 4 o'clock, and that, beginning with 4 o'clock, speeches be limited to ten minutes each, and that the Senate vote on the pending amendment and amendments to be offered and the bill itself before adjournment. Is there objection?

Mr. BACON. I wish to inquire if the form in which the Chair submitted it would not cut off morning business?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It would. That is in the agreement proposed.

Mr. HALE. I want to cut off morning business.

Mr. BACON. Very well, if that is the intention.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 17874) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers of said war.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the bill, with the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

SUSAN M. YEOMAN AND OTHERS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1589) granting an increase of pension to Susan M. Yeoman.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the bill, with the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BULKELEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4806) to amend the military record of Aaron Cornish, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 568) thereon.

Mr. DILLINGHAM, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6242) for the establishment of a probation and parole system for the District of Columbia, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 569) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6359) to change the name and jurisdiction of the inferior court of justice of the peace in the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report (No. 570) thereon.

JOSEPH S. OAKLEY.

Mr. FORAKER. I report back favorably without amendment from the Committee on Military Affairs the bill (S. 4451) to amend record and grant honorable discharge to Joseph S. Oakley, and I submit a report (No. 567) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to so amend the records of the War Department as to set aside the finding of the court-martial in the case of Joseph S. Oakley, late lieutenant, Company D, One hundred and twentieth New York Volunteer Infantry, and grant him an honorable discharge; but no bounty, pay, or other allowance shall become due by reason of the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDS IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. CLAPP. I report back from the Committee on Indian Affairs, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 19541) to authorize the drainage of certain lands in the State of Minnesota, and I submit a report (No. 571) thereon. It is a local bill, it relates only to the State of Minnesota; and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. I will be glad to explain it if anyone desires an explanation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The first amendment was, in section 5, page 2, line 25, after the word "time," to insert the words "within three months," so as to read:

That at any time within three months after any sale of unentered lands has been made in the manner and for the purposes mentioned in this act patent shall issue to the purchaser thereof upon payment to the receiver of the minimum price of $1.25 per acre, or such other price as may have been fixed by law for such lands, together with the usual fees and commissions charged in entry of like lands under the homestead laws.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, on page 3, line 7, after the word "laws," to insert:

If such payment is not made to the receiver within three months from the date of such sale all right to purchase or enter said land on the part of the person purchasing at the sale provided in section 3 of this act, shall cease and determine and said land shall, without further action or proceeding, be subject to entry under the homestead laws, subject first to the payment to the receiver of the minimum price of $1.25 per acre, or such price as may have been fixed by law for such land, together with the usual fees and commissions charged in entry; second, to the payment to the receiver by the purchaser at such sale of the amount appearing to have been paid therefor under the provisions of section 4 of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 6, page 3, line 21, after the word "time," to insert "within ninety days," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 6. That any unpatented lands sold in the manner and for the purposes mentioned in this act may be patented to the purchaser thereof at any time within ninety days after the expiration of the period of redemption provided for in the drainage laws under which it may be sold (there having been no redemption) upon the payment to the receiver of the fees and commissions and the price mentioned in the preceding section, or so much thereof as has not already been paid by the entryman; and if the sum received at any such sale shall be in excess of the payments herein required and of the drainage assessments and cost of the sale, such excess shall be paid to the proper county officer for the benefit of and payment to the entryman.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURKETT. I understood that the bill was being read for the information of the Senate and that it was not up for consideration.

Mr. CLAPP. Oh, no; I asked unanimous consent for its present consideration, and it was taken up.

Mr. BURKETT. No one could tell whether he had any objection to it until he knew something about the provisions of the bill.

Mr. CLAPP. I hope no objection will be made. It is absolutely local and pertains simply to the State of Minnesota.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 5, at the end of section 6, after the word "entryman," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That unless the payment of $1.25 per acre, or such other price as may have been fixed by law for such land, together with the usual fees and commissions charged in entries, be paid to the receiver within said ninety days all rights of the entryman and all rights of the purchaser at the sale provided for in section 3 of this act shall cease and determine, and said lands shall, without further action or proceedings, be subject to homestead entry under the provisions of the homestead laws, subject to paying to the receiver, first, the minimum price of $1.25 per acre, or such other price as may have been fixed by law for such lands, together with the usual fees and commissions charged in entry of like lands under the homestead laws, and, second, upon payment to the receiver for the benefit of the purchaser at the sale provided for in section 3 of this act the amount which may appear due from the statement of such sale provided for in section 4 of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add, at the end of the bill, a new section, as follows:

SEC. 8. That hereafter homestead entries and final proofs may be made upon all ceded Chippewa Indian lands in Minnesota embraced in the withdrawal under the act of June 21, 1906, entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department" (34 Stat. L., p. 325), and patents may issue thereon, as in other homestead cases, upon the payment by the entryman of the price prescribed by law for such lands, and on entries on the ceded Red Lake Reservation in addition thereto the sum of 3 cents per acre to repay the cost of the drainage survey thereof, which addition shall be disposed of the same as the other proceds of said land.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURKETT. I have been told privately, but I should like to ask the Senator if there is any general drainage legislation contained in the bill?

Mr. CLAPP. I stated, and I supposed the Senator heard the statement, that it is purely a local bill and applies only to lands in northern Minnesota. I can make a further explanation of the bill if any Senator cares for it.

Mr. BURKETT. I understood the Senator to make that statement privately, but I did not hear him say so in the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

ADDITIONAL BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. STEPHENSON (for Mr. LA FOLLETTE) introduced the following bills, which were severally read twice by their titles and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 6834) granting an increase of pension to Harrison J. Case;

A bill (S. 6835) granting a pension to Della S. Bond;

A bill (S. 6836) granting an increase of pension to James F. Spencer;

A bill (S. 6837) granting an increase of pension to Oscar C. Stevens;

A bill (S. 6838) granting an increase of pension to Mortica S. Smith; and

A bill (S. 6839) granting an increase of pension to George W. Van Tassel.

Mr. PILES introduced a bill (S. 6840) to amend the laws concerning transportation between ports of the Territory of Hawaii and other ports of the United States, which was read twice by its title and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

WIRELESS TELEGRAPH CONVENTION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed.

To the Senate:

I transmit herewith for the consideration of the Senate a copy of the action of the War Department, the Navy Department, and the Department of Commerce and Labor on the subject of the confirmation of the wireless telegraph convention signed at Berlin on November 3, 1906.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, April 25, 1908.

TESTS OF FUEL AND STRUCTURAL MATERIALS.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to transmit to the Senate a statement of the purposes and results of the investigations and tests of the fuels and structural materials of the United States, showing the bearing of these investigations on the conservation of the mineral resources of the country.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. TELLER. It has been the custom in the Senate for thirty-odd years, to my certain knowledge, to direct and not to request an officer, except the President. I move to amend the resolution so as to direct the Secretary of the Interior.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out the word "requested" and insert the word "directed."

Mr. HEMENWAY. I accept the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so modified. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

REPORT ON PETROLEUM INDUSTRY.

Mr. STEPHENSON. On behalf of my colleague [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] I submit a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to transmit to the Senate the report of the Commissioner of Corporations relating to the petroleum industry.

Mr. CARTER. I can not understand the necessity for authorizing the Secretary. I think the word "authorized" should be stricken from the resolution.

Mr. KEAN. I think I shall have to object to the consideration of the resolution to-day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the resolution will lie over.

TREATMENT OF NAVAJO INDIANS.

Mr. TELLER submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish for the information of the Senate copies of all correspondence and other papers on file in his Department or in the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs relating to employment of United States soldiers during the year 1907 within or in the vicinity of the Navajo Indian Reservation, Arizona, in arresting By-alil-le and other Navajo Indians, which resulted in the killing by the soldiers or others of two Indians and the wounding of at least one other Indian, and such correspondence and other data, if any, as will furnish the names and the number of Navajo and other Indians who were imprisoned at any time within the three years last past, together with the names of those now imprisoned, in the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, the charges against each of said Indians, by whom made, by what legally constituted court or other proceeding they were adjudged guilty of the charges against them, as a result of which the said Indians were imprisoned, the terms of their sentences, and whether at hard labor or otherwise.

RIGHTS OF THE STATES.

Mr. TELLER. I send to the desk a resolution which I ask to have read and then lie on the table.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolved, That the maintenance of the principles promulgated in the Declaration of Independence and embodied in the Federal Constitution are essential to the preservation of our republican institutions, and that the Federal Constitution, the rights of the States, and the Union of the States must be preserved.

That the maintenance inviolate of the rights of the States, and especially the right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to that balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depends.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be printed and lie on the table.

COMPANIES B, C, AND D, TWENTY-FIFTH INFANTRY.

Mr. BULKELEY. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Thursday next I will ask the Senate to listen to some remarks on Senate bill 5729, in regard to the Brownsville affray, on the supposition that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] will then have completed his remarks. I learn from him that owing to his condition of health he will require at least the morning hours of Tuesday and Wednesday under the present arrangement.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to ask my colleague on the committee a question. I assume that his notice to speak is not intended to interfere with appropriation bills?

Mr. BULKELEY. No, sir; not in any way.

RESURVEY OF TOWNSHIPS IN COLORADO.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6033) to provide for the resurvey of certain townships in Colorado.

Mr. KEAN. The bill has already been read, I understand. I objected to it when it was up before.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 1, beginning with line 5, to strike out all down to and including the word "meridian," on line 9, page 3, and to insert:

Township 9 north, of ranges 86, 87, 88, and 89; township 8 north, of ranges 86, 87, 88, and 89; township 7 north, of ranges 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, and 91; township 6 north, of ranges 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, and 91; township 5 north, of ranges 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, and 91; township 4 north, of ranges 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, and 91; township 3 north, of ranges 85 and 86; township 1 south, of ranges 101 and 102; township 2 south, of ranges 101 and 102; township 3 south, of ranges 100, 101, 102, and 103; township 4 south, of ranges 100, 101, and 102; township 7 south, of range 102; township 8 south, of ranges 102 and 103; township 10 south, of range 97; township 11 south, of ranges 97 and 98; township 12 south, of ranges 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, and 98; township 13 south, of ranges 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, and 98; township 14 south, of ranges 89 and 96; township 12 north, of ranges 87, 88, 89, 90, and 91; township 11 north, of ranges 87, 88, 89, and 90; township 10 north, of ranges 86, 87, 88, and 89; township 4 north, of range 90; township 3 north, of ranges 88, 89, 90, and 91; township 15 south, of rane 89, all west of the sixth principal meridian.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add, at the end of the bill, the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That the resurvey herein provided for be restricted to townships in which more than half of the area at the time of entering upon the work of resurvey is public land.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AUXILIARY NAVY.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I offer the following substitute for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES] to the naval appropriation bill now pending. I will read it, as it is somewhat indistinct:

Substitute by Mr. NEWLANDS for the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES] to the bill (H. R. 20471) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes.

The following to be added after line 5, page 87:

"For an auxiliary navy, consisting of transports, colliers, scouts, dispatch boats, and other vessels necessary in aid of the fighting ships in case of war, $20,000,000, and the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and the Postmaster-General are hereby constituted a commission to recommend to Congress a plan for utilizing such ships in times of peace as training ships for a naval reserve and at the same time utilizing them under lease to private shipping companies or otherwise in projecting new routes of mail and commerce to foreign ports.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT EVERETT, WASH.

Mr. ANKENY. I wish to call up the bill (S. 4242) providing for the erection of a public building at the city of Everett, in the State of Washington.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 2, line 1, before the word "hundred," to strike out "four" and insert "two," so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase, or acquire by condemnation proceedings, a site and cause to be erected thereon, at the city of Everett, in the State of Washington, a suitable building for the use and accommodation of the United States courts, the post-office, and other Government offices in said city, with fireproof vaults extending to each story, the site and building thereon, when completed according to plans and specifications to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, not to exceed the cost of $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 1, after the word "dollars," to strike out the following words:

And the sum of $400,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated for the purchase of said site and the completion of said building.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 19, to strike out the following:

If, upon consideration of said report and accompanying papers, the Secretary of the Treasury shall deem further investigation necessary, he may appoint a commission of not more than three persons, one of whom shall be an officer of the Treasury Department, which commission shall also examine the said proposed site and such others as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate, and grant such hearings in relation thereto as they shall deem necessary; and said commission shall, within thirty days after such examination, make to the Secretary of the Treasury written report of their conclusion in the premises, accompanied by all statements, maps, plats, or documents taken or submitted to them in like manner as hereinbefore provided in regard to the proceedings of said agent of the Treasury Department; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon finally determine the location of the building to be erected.

The compensation of said commissioners shall be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but the same shall not exceed $6 per day and actual traveling expenses: Provided, however, That the member of said commission appointed from the Treasury Department shall be paid only his actual traveling expenses.

So much of the appropriation herein made as may be necessary to defray the expenses of advertising for proposals, actual traveling expenses of said agent, and the compensation and actual traveling expenses of said commissioners and other expenses incident to the selection of the site, and for necessary survey thereof, shall be immediately available.

No money appropriated by this act shall be available, except as hereinbefore provided, until a valid title to the site for said building shall be vested in the United States, nor until the State of Washington shall have ceded to the United States exclusive jurisdiction over the same, during the time the United States shall be or remain the owner thereof, for all purposes except the administration of the criminal laws of said State and the service of civil process therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building at the city of Everett, in the State of Washington."

MONUMENT TO GEN. PATRICK EDWARD CONNOR.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (S. 643) for the erection of a monument to the memory of Gen. Patrick Edward Connor.

The Secretary read the bill, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to appropriate $20,000 for the purpose of procuring and erecting in Salt Lake City, Utah, a suitable monument to the memory of Gen. Patrick Edward Connor, the same to be expended and the site therefor selected under the direction of a commission composed of the Secretary of War and the governor of Utah.

Mr. KEAN. In order that my memory may be refreshed as to the valuable services of this gentleman, I should like to have the report published with the bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I ask that the report may be printed without being read.

There being no objection, the report, submitted by Mr. WETMORE on the 17th instant, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPORT.

[To accompany S. 643.]

The Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the bill (S. 643) for the erection of a monument to the memory of Gen. Patrick Edward Connor, have had the same under consideration and report it back without amendment.

Gen. Patrick Edward Connor came to America from Ireland at a very early age. He enlisted in the Regular Army and served on the southwestern frontier for five years. During the Mexican war he raised a company of volunteers in Texas and led them as their captain at the battle of Buena Vista, where he was wounded and received honorable mention for gallantry in the official dispatches. At the close of the Mexican war he settled in California. When the civil war broke out he was offered the colonelcy of the Third California Volunteers. His command consisted of the Third California Volunteer Infantry and a part of the Second California Cavalry, afterwards joined by a few companies from Nevada, and numbering all told 700 men. These troops had volunteered in the expectation of being ordered to the seat of war, but the long march overland was considered too irksome, and Colonel Connor was ordered to remain in Utah. About this time Connor was made brigadier-general.

General Connor's greatest service while stationed in Utah, outside of the firm stand he took in behalf of law and order, was his masterly campaign against the Shoshones and Bannocks, which ended in what is known as the battle of Bear River. For fifteen years these Northern tribes had infested the overland mail route, slaughtering and plundering emigrants, massacring settlers and burning their homes. General Connor determined to put a stop to these savageries and marched against the Indians in January, 1863. The main battle was fought on the 29th and the power of the Indians was broken. This victory opened up the fertile lands of Idaho and the North to settlement. This Indian war and the magnificent results which followed General Connor's victory have not received adequate recognition in the pages of history for the reason that our country was at the time engaged in the all-absorbing strife of the civil war, and the exploits of such soldiers as General Connor did not receive the attention, nor the commanders the credit, which would have resulted in times of peace. The grave of General Connor occupies a plot of ground in the military cemetery at Fort Douglas. It is proposed to erect a monument in his honor at some spot in Salt Lake City best suited to the purpose.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I want to say just a word or two. I knew Pat Connor, and I knew him very well. I knew him in the early days when he was out in the West, and I want to vote for his monument. I am very glad to do it.

Mr. KEAN. I have had no idea of voting against the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS SMITH.

Mr. BULKELEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4134) to correct the military record of Thomas Smith.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of War to grant to Thomas Smith, a corporal of Company I, Eighty-seventh New York Infantry Volunteers, an honorable discharge as of date of June 30, 1862; but no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MIRRICK R. BURGESS.

Mr. BULKELEY. I now ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 40) to correct the military record of Mirick R. Burgess.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 4, after the words "record of," to strike out "Mirick" and insert "Mirrick," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to correct the military record of Mirrick R. Burgess, late of Company I, Third Regiment New Hampshire Volunteer Infantry, and Company H, Twelfth Regiment United States Infantry, and grant him an honorable discharge as of date March 28, 1863: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emolument shall accrue by reason of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to correct the military record of Mirrick R. Burgess."

PUBLIC PARK IN WOODWARD, OKLA.

Mr. OWEN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 12773) granting to the city of Woodward, in the State of Oklahoma, lot 2, block 48, for park and other public purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to grant to the city of Woodward, Okla., lot No. 2, in block No. 48, in that city, for the use and benefit of the inhabitants of that city, for park and other public purposes.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN OATES.

Mr. BULKELEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5883) to correct the military record of John A. Oates.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 5, after the name "John," to strike out the initial "A," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to review the military record and revoke the order of dismissal by general courts-martial of John Oates, late a private in Company D, Fourteenth United States Infantry, and issue to him an honorable discharge as of September 21, 1864: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to correct the military record of John Oates."

PUBLIC BUILDING AT MILLEDGEVILLE, GA.

Mr. CLAY. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 2734) to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Milledgeville, Ga.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, at the top of page 2, to insert "The building to be erected shall be unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet on each side, including streets and alleys," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and cause to be erected thereon a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, elevators, and heating and ventilating apparatus, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office, in the city of Milledgeville, Ga., the cost of said site and building, including said vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, not to exceed $50,000.

The building to be erected shall be unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet on each side, including streets and alleys.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon in the city of Milledgeville, Ga."

COMPANIES B, C, AND D, TWENTY-FIFTH INFANTRY.

Mr. WARNER. I do not know whether it is in the RECORD, but I should like to have it appear that the time for me to continue my address on the Brownsville affair has been changed from Monday, April 27, to Tuesday, April 28.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, April 27, 1908, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 25, 1908.

[Continuation of the legislative day of Monday, April 20, 1908.]

The recess having expired, at 11.30 o'clock a. m. the House was called to order by the Speaker.

COTTON FUTURES.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the House resolution No. 338, offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] and debated yesterday.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. PAYNE. I understand that the gentleman from Mississippi asks for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. PAYNE. Then, Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The point is well taken. The Doorkeeper will close the doors. The Sergeant-at-Arms will notify absent Members. Those favoring the motion will answer "yea," those opposed will answer "nay," those present and not voting will answer "present." The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 218, nays 19, answered "present" 15, not voting 135, as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. CROCKETT, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill and joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6539. An act to authorize the Copper River and Northwestern Railway Company to construct a bridge across Bering Lake, in the district of Alaska; and

S. R. 75. Joint resolution authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to make a survey and examination for a continuous waterway from Boston, Mass., by various routes to Wilmington, N. C.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. R. 75. Joint resolution authorizing and directing the Secretary of War to make a survey and examination for a continuous waterway from Boston, Mass., by various routes to Wilmington, N. C.—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

COMPENSATION IN CUSTOMS SERVICE.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the following bill, with two amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 21003) fixing the compensation of certain officials in the customs service, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to increase and fix the compensation of laborers in the customs service, as he may think advisable, to a rate not exceeding $840 per annum.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to increase and fix the compensation of inspectors of customs, as he may think advisable, not to exceed in any case the rate of $5 per diem, and in all cases where the maximum compensation is paid no allowance shall be made for meals or other expenses incurred by inspectors when required to work at unusual hours.

SEC. 3. That hereafter deputy collectors, assistant appraisers and examiners of merchandise, examiners of tea, and examiners and special examiners of drugs, in the customs service, shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury on the nomination of the collector or appraiser, respectively, in their respective districts; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to fix the compensation of each in such an amount as he shall deem proper, not exceeding $3,500 per annum.

SEC. 4. That hereafter deputy naval officers and deputy surveyors of customs shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury on the nomination of the naval officer or surveyor, respectively, in their respective districts; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to fix the compensation of each in such an amount as he shall deem proper, not exceeding $3,000 per annum.

SEC. 5. That section 2746 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows, to wit:

"SEC. 2746. An additional compensation of 25 per cent shall be continued to the appraisers, deputy collectors, deputy surveyors, deputy naval officers, and weighers at the port of San Francisco."

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to increase and fix the compensation of assistant weighers in the customs service as he may think advisable, not to exceed in any case the rate of $4 per diem.

SEC. 7. That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. A second is ordered under the rules.

Mr. DALZELL. This bill, Mr. Speaker, comes from the Committee on Ways and Means. It proposes an increase in the salaries of a number of customs officials. There were twenty-nine bills before the Committee on Ways and Means relating to this subject. Some of them related only to the salaries of customs officers in the city of New York; some of them related to salaries of customs officers in various other ports—Philadelphia, Boston, and San Francisco. The committee had a number of hearings, and heard, among other parties, the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, who has in charge the administration of the customs law, and also the collector of the port of New York, and concluded, after hearing all of these parties, that there was a substantial demand, in justice, for an increase in the salaries of those various officials.

Section 1 authorizes an increase in the pay of laborers to a maximum of $840 per annum. I ought to say that in all cases the law merely fixes a maximum, and leaves to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury the fixing of the real salary in each case. Laborers are now paid—the highest of them—$770 per annum, and this authorizes an increase to the maximum of $840 per annum, within the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. There is no law now fixing the pay of laborers.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The Treasury Department takes care of the Government buildings. They have laborers employed for this purpose?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I think the highest pay these laborers now receive in New York and Chicago is $50, and elsewhere not to exceed $45 a month. Would this in any way authorize an increase of their pay?

Mr. DALZELL. The law as it exists now does not fix the pay of laborers. The Secretary of the Treasury fixes the pay and pays them out of a lump appropriation. They now get, the highest of them, $770 a year, and this bill proposes to authorize an increase of the pay to $840 a year. This refers to laborers in the customs service. This $770 per annum is the figure that was given us by the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and related to laborers in the customs service, and this bill, if passed, will authorize an allowance to laborers in the customs service up to the maximum of $840 per annum, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MANN. All these are paid out of the permanent appropriations?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes.

Mr. MANN. So that the Secretary of the Treasury will have the money with which to make this increase, if he chooses?

Mr. DALZELL. He has not had it heretofore.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does the bill under consideration include any laborers outside of the customs service?

Mr. DALZELL. Not at all.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is confined to the customs service?

Mr. McCALL. The whole bill relates to the customs service?

Mr. DALZELL. The whole bill relates to the customs service.

Mr. STAFFORD. It does not relate to other laborers in charge of buildings?

Mr. DALZELL. It relates simply to the customs service. The Committee on Ways and Means would not have had jurisdiction of any other subject.

The next section authorizes an increase in the pay of inspectors to the maximum of $5 a day. The pay of inspectors was fixed a great many years ago at $3 a day. More than forty years ago it was increased to $4 a day, and two years ago or four years ago, I do not now recall exactly, the pay of inspectors at the port of New York was increased to $5 a day. That left a discrimination, of course, between the inspectors of the port of New York and the inspectors of the various other ports of the country, Boston, Philadelphia, San Francisco, and so forth. Now, in the judgment of the committee, in view of changed conditions, the increase in the cost of living, and so on, it was deemed only fair that the pay should be increased to the maximum of $5 a day and that no discrimination should be made between the inspectors of the various ports. So, instead of making one allowance for New York and another for other ports, the bill fixes the maximum of $5 a day for inspectors at all ports of the United States.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALZELL. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Take, for instance, my city of Syracuse. The custom-house is in the same building with the post-office and the collector of customs is the custodian of the building. He has charge of all the laborers, hires them all, and has control of them. Now, these laborers not only take care of the rooms used for the custom-house, but they take care of all the buildings, the court rooms, and the post-office. Has he a right to raise the wages of all these men—consider them all employees of the customs service?

Mr. DALZELL. If they are in the custom service, he will have, under this bill, the discretion to raise their compensation to the maximum of $840 a year.

Mr. DRISCOLL. There are three laborers besides the head man. They are getting $45 a month. Some of that labor is taking care of the rooms used for the custom-house, and those men would be in the custom service. My question is, Could all the men be raised as in the customs service?

Mr. DALZELL. I do not think parties who take charge of rooms in a building and do the sweeping and things of that sort are laborers in the customs service. They have nothing to do with the administration of the customs law. They are not like laborers employed on the dock and under the collector.

Mr. DRISCOLL. I did not suppose laborers had much to do with the administration of the customs service, anyway. They do what they are told.

Mr. DALZELL. When they do that, they do well.

Mr. DRISCOLL. How much is the aggregate additional expense if the Secretary of the Treasury exercises his discretion and increases the wages all along the line to the maximum allowed in this bill?

Mr. DALZELL. That I can not tell. We have no sufficient data to answer that question.

Mr. HINSHAW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. HINSHAW. How many laborers are there whose pay is increased?

Mr. DALZELL. I have just said to the gentleman from New York that we have no data that would enable us to answer that question.

Mr. MORSE. I would like to ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. DALZELL. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MORSE. Are these men under the civil service; are they required to take a civil-service examination?

Mr. DALZELL. No; they are not in the classified service.

Mr. MORSE. Is the Government having any trouble in securing inspectors at the price now paid?

Mr. DALZELL. The inspectors are in the classified service. The collector at the port of New York says that he has great trouble in keeping good men, because they can get a larger salary outside than is paid in the customs service.

Mr. MORSE. Is it not a fact that men are seeking appointment, and willing to take the place at the price now paid?

Mr. DALZELL. I can not answer that. We took the judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury and the customs officers as to the fairness of this measure.

Mr. PORTER. Do I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the salaries of the inspectors at all custom-houses are increased?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes; not to exceed $5 a day.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I would like to ask the gentleman just one question.

Mr. DALZELL. Now, Mr. Speaker, I can not stop to answer more questions; I shall not get through this bill to-day.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Has the committee considered the increase of salary of the appraisers?

Mr. DALZELL. We have, and I will come to that. These inspectors are on duty from sunrise to sunset and sometimes during the night. Where they are employed during the night in caring for freight and inspecting freight, they are paid by the steamship companies. Where they are employed in the inspection of baggage, they get no extra pay.

The next, section 3, increases the pay of deputy collectors, assistant appraisers, examiners of merchandise, examiners of teas, and special examiners of drugs to a maximum of $3,500 per annum. They now receive $3,000, except two at New York, who get $3,500 under a law passed at the last Congress.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Right there, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. According to that the salary of assistant appraisers in this case has been fixed at $3,500. The appraiser at St. Louis, Mo., whose business has increased during the last ten years about 300 per cent, is receiving only $3,000. I introduced a bill in regard to that making the salary $4,000, and I would like to inquire whether cases of that kind have been taken into consideration?

Mr. DALZELL. All the bills were taken into consideration, and the committee decided that $3,500 was a fair amount of salary. Of course these officers are skilled specially. The collector of customs complains that where he has a thoroughly educated officer who becomes skilled in the duties of his office, he loses him because it becomes important to the importer that he should have the services of such an officer, and he is willing to pay him a larger salary than the Government is paying.

Mr. RYAN. Does this resolution provide for an increase in the pay of inspectors from $4 to $5 a day throughout the country?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes. Section 4 authorizes an increase of pay for deputy naval officers and deputy surveyors to a maximum of $3,000. They have been receiving a salary of $2,500, so that the increase is $500.

Section 5 amends section 2746 of the Revised Statutes by adding the weigher to the list of officials at San Francisco, to whom an additional compensation of 25 per cent may be paid. In the adoption of this section of the Revised Statutes, for some reason or other this weigher was dropped out, left unprovided for, and the object of this section is to restore him to the former place.

Section 6 authorizes an increase of pay of assistant weighers to $4. They are now paid $3 all over the country, and this authorizes an increase to $4.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman say what may be the total cost of the bill?

Mr. DALZELL. We have not any accurate figures as to that, but in the neighborhood, probably, of $300,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I have not read the bill—I have not had an opportunity—but I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question. It does not give anywhere in it any authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to change headquarters of the customs districts?

Mr. DALZELL. No; it relates only to pay—compensation. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes remaining.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] has stated, this is a bill to increase the salaries of various officials in the customs service, and also to limit the amount of compensation which can be paid annually to the laborers in that service. That is the effect of the bill. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has already stated in the main the increase of salaries given to these various customs officials. The bill purports to give an increase to the laborers employed in the customs service. As a matter of fact, there is no limitation at present on the amount of the wages that can be paid in the customs service. It has been customary heretofore to pay the laborer an amount equal to about $770 a year. The bill provides that not more than $840 a year, or a compensation monthly equal to that, can be paid to any laborer in the customs service.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman specify the character of work performed by these laborers?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not fully, but my understanding is that they are largely the men who will be handling the goods and doing the work around the ships and at the customs office.

Mr. STAFFORD. The purpose of my inquiry is to reconcile, if possible, the inequality of the salaries paid to laborers in the care of public buildings where they receive a maximum of $45 per month in cities, except Chicago and New York, with this provision, where the laborers are to receive $840 a year.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes, there is a great deal of difference, but the proposition to which I wish to refer in this bill is this: I am not in favor of the general increase of these salaries, but I do not see the necessity of putting a limitation on the amount that can be paid to labor, and for this reason: They may receive a sufficient compensation, or they may not, but where a man is employed at a fixed salary as an officer of the Government, an inspector or a weigher, he is in a yearly employment—he is in a fixed position. You can fix his salary, fix his compensation, but when you are dealing with labor you can not handle the situation in that way. To-day there may be an immense demand for labor, and to-morrow there may be no demand for labor. The result is that if a number of ships come into a port it is necessary to unload them, and it is necessary to have the labor there, and there ought to be a latitude—a wide latitude—for the customs officials to exercise their judgment in employing that labor, because they have to pay what labor is worth at the time. Therefore I do not see any necessity in this bill in putting a limitation which the bill carries on the price that shall be paid for labor at these ports.

Mr. KELIHER. Do I understand the gentleman to object to the maximum fixed?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; I do not see any necessity for putting the maximum in there. We have run along for many years without any maximum, leaving it discretionary in the customs officials.

Mr. KELIHER. The gentleman must know that it is a fact that the reason why this increase has not been made in the past is due to the failure of the Committee on Appropriations to appropriate a sufficient amount of money for the Secretary of the Treasury to make the increases that the good of the service demanded.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is a question for the Appropriations Committee, and not the law. It is in the power of the Committee on Appropriations, in their judgment, to allow what they think is proper for the employment of labor in these matters, and I judge that the Committee on Appropriations exercises its judgment as it thinks proper and right.

Mr. KELIHER. Would the gentleman go further and mandatorily fix a minimum salary to be paid the laborers?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. This bill does not do it.

Mr. KELIHER. Would the gentleman do it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There is no necessity for it. Nothing is accomplished by this, except it may embarrass the customs officers in the administration of the law.

Mr. KELIHER. Yes; but this legislation, if passed, may be used as a lever upon the Appropriations Committee to get an appropriation which will allow the officials to pay the laborers the salary they should have.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It merely says they shall not go above a certain figure; it does not say they shall all come to a certain figure. It is a limitation, not a lever. It does not offer anything that may in the future embarrass the administration of any customs office of a port. On the other hand, though, as to the salaries paid to the inspectors, the deputy collectors, appraisers, and the deputy naval officers, they have been receiving a fair compensation in the past. Now, it is contended before the committee that the compensation is not sufficient to get good officers; that by reason of the increased cost of living that these men should receive additional compensation. Now, all I have to say along that line is this: That here for the last ten years the price of living has been rising year after year and year after year, and bills of this kind have been pending in the committee for the last ten years advocating an increase of these salaries to these officers because the cost of living was increasing, but here to-day we come to a proposition where the cost of living is falling. In all the time that the cost of living in the United States was increasing there was no effort made by the committee to bring out one of these bills and to pass a bill of this kind; but when we reach a panic and a panicky condition, when the cost of living is falling in every respect, when the price of foodstuff has come down and the price of clothing has come down and the price of rental has come down, the committee comes before the House with a proposition to pass a bill to increase salaries because the cost of living is increasing, when, as a matter of fact, the cost of living is falling to-day, and will continue to fall until this panic is over.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman pardon an interruption for a moment? The cost of living has not decreased in New York City, nor in the other large cities of the country, and from personal experience I want to say to the distintinguished gentleman from Alabama that I know the men in the customs service in New York, the laborers and the inspectors, are not getting sufficient money to enable them to meet the cost of living in that large city.

Mr. ADAIR. None have resigned.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My friend on my right suggests none of them have resigned on that account. I have only a few minutes and I can not yield further——

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The difficulty is to get other employment perhaps; but notwithstanding the fact remains that they do not get adequate salaries for their faithful and efficient work, and that the cost of living has not decreased, as the gentleman from Alabama suggests.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, I beg the gentleman's pardon. The cost of living in New York City I can not speak of; but this bill is not a bill for New York City——

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. But other cities are in the same category.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. This bill is a bill for the customs service of the United States from Maine to California, and there is not any question about the proposition that the cost of living in the United States is falling all along the line; foodstuffs are going down.

Mr. KELIHER. Will the gentleman yield for a moment? Does the gentleman disapprove of that feature of this bill which equalizes the salary of inspectors and other officers?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; I do agree with the gentleman, and I am coming to that——

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. It confers discretionary power on the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman will allow me to have the floor I will be obliged, for I can not speak with so many gentlemen interrupting me. I do agree that these salaries ought to be equalized, that they ought to be readjusted, and that there is need for legislation; but I do contend that this bill ought to be defeated, and why? Because for years we have gone along increasing the salaries, increasing compensation in the customs service, until we have increased the cost of collecting customs revenues way beyond the cost of collecting the internal revenue. It is costing this country a great deal more to collect the customs revenues than it does the countries of Europe, where they have a border line not fenced in by water and by oceans, but fenced in by bayonets to protect them against smuggling, and yet our cost of collecting customs has increased above theirs. Now, I wish to call attention to the difference in the cost of collection between the internal revenue and the customs collections.

We would naturally presume that it would cost a great deal more money to collect the internal revenue of this country than it would the customs revenue. Why? Because you have got to have a man at every distillery. You have got to have agents all over the country. You have got to watch the sale of tobacco. You have got to go out in the country and see that there is no violation of the internal-revenue laws, and you have got to have a great many more men. On the other hand, in the customs service the smuggling is protected by the Revenue-Cutter Service, and that is not included in this cost. On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, the customs service is brought to particular ports. It is brought where the officers of the Government can be concentrated.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield right in that connection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will, for a question.

Mr. KAHN. Certainly. Is it not a fact that by the reason of the customs being collected principally in the large cities of the country that the salaries should be raised because the cost of living in those large cities has gone up so greatly in recent years?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will answer that by saying to the gentleman from California that the fact is that the salaries now of the customs officers are very much greater than the salaries of similar officers for the collection of internal revenue, and most of those officers live in the large cities. But what I say is, that there is such a difference in the cost of collecting this revenue. Now, I will call the attention of the House to this fact, that in 1900 the collections of internal revenue amounted to $295,000,000, that the expense of collecting the same was $4,446,000 or 1½ per cent. The amount of customs revenue collected in that time was $233,000,000. The cost of collecting the same was $7,467,000, or 3.21 per cent. I have the figures here for the other years, but I will come down to 1905 to show that it is not improving at all. In 1905 the internal revenue collected amounted to $234,000,000, collected at a cost of $4,338,000, or a cost of collection of 1.85 per cent, whereas the customs revenue collected was $261,000,000, collected at an expense of $9,115,000, or a percentage of 3.48 per cent, it costing more than twice as much to-day to collect the customs revenue in this country than it does the internal revenue of this country.

Now, I say that there is no necessity for that. If this system of collections was properly investigated by the committee and properly considered, we could reduce the cost of collecting the customs revenue down to the neighborhood of the cost of collecting the internal revenue. But, following the position that our Republican friends have always maintained when there is anything in reference to tariff customs collection or customs revenue, of "standing pat" and never revising anything, this cost of collecting the revenue is going on up, steadily increasing, steadily accumulating, and I say it is the duty of this House to vote down this bill. I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. KELIHER] that there ought to be some adjustment of this matter. I am in favor of an adjustment of it, but I am not in favor of picking out a few favorite places and increasing the salaries and never adjust by cutting down the cost of this service where it ought to be cut down.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Does the gentleman believe that $840 per annum to a laborer, who works pretty hard, I assure the gentleman, is too much?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman is taking up my time without listening to what I have said. This bill does not propose to increase the salary of the laborers, and if you vote for the bill with the idea that you are increasing any laborer's salary, you will be making a mistake. This bill puts a limitation on the cost of labor that is not in the law to-day. It holds down the salary of the laborer.

Mr. DIXON. Is there any complaint that it is impossible to secure competent men at these prices?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not at all.

Mr. KELIHER. Will the gentleman point out the way it will hinder the customs if we pass this bill?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It will hinder it in this way: If we go on increasing the salaries when anybody asks for an increase in salary, and never investigate the matter at all of reducing the cost where it ought to be reduced, we will never get a bill through this House for a reduction.

Why, I say to the gentleman that in some parts of this country where there is $5 of revenue collected it costs $1,600 to-day to collect that $5 of revenue. Now, does the gentleman say that we ought to continue to give it, and make a service in this country authorizing a system where it is to cost us $1,600 to collect $5, instead of revising these laws?

Mr. KELIHER. I say to the gentleman that that wrong in the administration should not be visited on the men who are manifestly entitled to more pay, and which the pending measure provides.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly not.

Mr. KELIHER. As an evidence of the inequality of salaries paid, take the case of inspectors. Twenty years ago in Boston we had eighty-five of them, receiving $4 per day; now we have only seventy-seven, and their compensation is the same. Yet in that time the business of our port has increased amazingly. Our imports have increased 100 per cent in twenty years, and our exports, too, have grown tremendously. Is it not unfair that those inspectors should not be put upon a par with those of New York?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I say it is the duty of this House and it is the duty of the country to demand that the Ways and Means Committee shall go into this question and revise the entire collection of the customs revenue before we put any more burdens on the country by way of raising the cost of collection. If you do not reduce some day, you will go on until it will cost us twice as much—not only twice as much more to collect the customs duties than the internal revenue, as it occurs to-day, but it will cost twice as much to collect the customs revenue as it costs in any country in Europe.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARSONS].

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, this bill has the advantage of designating, in section 1, a more suitable salary for laborers than has heretofore been designated. I wish to say to the House that recently some scientific investigations have been made in New York in regard to the cost of living of laborers in that city. Some were made by the committee on standards of living appointed by the New York State conference of charities and correction. I will read two conclusions of that committee. The first is:

> It requires no citation of elaborate statistics to bring convincing proof that from six to seven hundred dollars is wholly inadequate to maintain a proper standard of living, and no self-respecting family should be asked or expected to live on such an income.

In New York at the present time some of the laborers not covered by this bill receive only $600 a year.

I hope that section 1 of this bill will be a precedent for Congress to see that the pay of these other laborers is also increased.

The second conclusion of this committee relates to those who receive from $700 to $800 a year, and the committee said:

> A family can barely support itself on that amount, provided that it is subject to no extraordinary expenditures by reason of sickness, death, or other untoward circumstances, and such a family can live without charitable assistance through exceptional management and the absence of emergencies.

Mr. ADAIR. Does this bill provide for an increase of the salaries of the class that you have referred to?

Mr. PARSONS. Well, it provides for an increase in the pay of laborers who now receive $720 or $770 a year; but this clause does not cover all the laborers in the Treasury Department, and I hope it will be a precedent for these others.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman inform us from what he was reading?

Mr. PARSONS. I have read from the report of the special committee of the eighth New York State conference of charities and correction; and later in the session, when I have more time, I hope, for the information of the House, to furnish the figures giving the average income of these various classes of laborers' families investigated and the different items of expense.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PARSONS. Certainly.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], in discussing this question this morning, asserted that the cost of living had gone down. I desire to ask my colleague from New York whether it is not a fact that the cost of living is just as great to-day as it was a year or two ago—that the rents are the same, if not greater, and that the cost of living has gradually become higher in the large cities of this country, and that these men are in fact greatly underpaid?

Mr. PARSONS. The second largest item in New York has always been——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman from Alabama does not attack the increase of the salaries affected by this bill on the merits, but because he says the cost of the customs service is too great.

Why these faithful officers in the customs service should be punished because Congress refuses to consolidate ports is beyond my ken. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] knows, and all the Members of this House know, that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means in the last Congress tried time and again to wipe out these ports that ought not to exist where it costs more to collect the revenue than the revenue itself amounts to, and the Congress refused to do it. Now, if Congress refuses to do what it ought to do in that direction, that furnishes no reason why Congress should not be just to faithful officers in the customs service.

Now, one word more. The gentleman from Alabama complains of the cost of the collection of the customs; but I want to call attention to the unfairness of the method by which he arrives at his conclusion. He takes the revenues of a certain year, the total cost of collection, and arrives at a percentage; but by doing that he includes all of these ports at which the cost of collection is in excess of the revenue itself. The cost of collecting the revenue at the port of New York, where seven-tenths of all our revenue is collected, is 1.8 cents on the dollar. The gentleman says it costs more for us to collect the revenue than it costs to collect the revenue in England, a little island without any contiguous territory, where the revenue is collected on a few things only—spirits, tobacco, and tea. And yet, notwithstanding the gentleman's complaint, the revenue is collected at the port of New York for a cent less on the dollar than it is in England.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. This bill does not simply provide for the port of New York. It provides for the country.

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly; but I am showing the unfairness of the gentleman's claim that the cost of collecting our revenue is in excess of what it ought to be. The cost of collecting the revenue at New York is 1.8 cents on the dollar. The cost of collecting the revenue in Great Britain is 2.7 cents on the dollar.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. As many as favor the motion will say "aye;" those opposed, "no."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 152, nays 85, answered "present" 9, not voting 141, as follows:

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall and listening when his name should have been called?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I was called to the telephone and missed the calling of my name.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rules.

Mr. FORNES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall of the House and listening at the time when his name should have been called?

Mr. FORNES. I was not. I came in after my name was called.

The SPEAKER. Under the gentleman's statement he is not entitled to vote.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote. I was in my committee room and started for the Hall of the House as soon as the first call bell sounded. The bell was very slow in sounding, evidently, because when I reached the Hall of the House my name had been called.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the gentleman is not entitled to vote.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

FORT LAWTON MILITARY RESERVATION, WASH.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 5126) to grant to the city of Seattle, in the State of Washington, certain rights of way for sewer and street purposes through and along the military Reservation at Fort Lawton, Wash., and through the reservations for the Lake Washington Canal, as amended by the House committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington moves to suspend the rules and pass the following Senate bill, with amendments, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the city of Seattle, a municipal corporation of the State of Washington, is hereby granted the right to construct and maintain a tunnel for sewer and drainage purposes under and across the military reservation of Fort Lawton, Wash., from a point on the east boundary of said reservation so selected that the central line of said tunnel shall bear north 82° west, approximately, to the intersection of L street and Delaware avenue (formerly McGraw street) of the Seattle tide lands; thence northwesterly into Puget Sound: Provided, That all work on the reservation shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War and to such regulations as he may prescribe in the interest of good order and to prevent any unnecessary injury to the reservation or to public property thereon: Provided further, That if, at any time, the discharge of said sewer shall become injurious to the sanitary conditions of Fort Lawton, the city of Seattle, upon notification by the Secretary of War, shall take prompt measures to abate the objectionable features: And provided further, That if the construction of the Lake Washington Canal shall have been decided upon before the completion of said sewer, the city of Seattle, with the supervision and approval of the Secretary of War, may so modify the location of the outfall and the route across the reservation as best to meet the new conditions created by the canal.

SEC. 2. That the city of Seattle is also granted a right of way 150 feet wide, for street and tunnel purposes, across the reservations for the old and new locations of the Lake Washington Canal—the central line of said right of way bearing approximately north from a point on the south line of the old location reserve, situated about 639 feet westerly from the southerly monument in Twenty-fourth avenue north (formerly East street); together with the use for similar purposes of land included by the south boundary of the old location reserve, the east boundary of said right of way, a line bearing approximately north from said southerly monument, about 70 feet, to the northerly monument in Twenty-fourth street, a line bearing westerly from said northerly monument, parallel to and 70 feet distant from the southerly line of the old location reserve, about 460 feet in length, and a line from the westerly end of the last-mentioned line, bearing north about 44 degrees and 14 minutes west, about 150 feet, to the east boundary of said right of way: Provided, That any structures placed by said city in said right of way shall be subject to the supervision of the Secretary of War and to such changes as he may from time to time prescribe in order that the use of said rights of way shall not obstruct any improvements which the United States may make on said reservations.

SEC. 3. That the city of Seattle is also granted the right to construct and maintain a tunnel to carry water, sewer, gas, and other pipes, and electric wires, under and across the Lake Washington Canal Reservation near Third avenue, west, in the city of Seattle, subject to such conditions as to location and plans of the tunnel and to such changes in respect thereto as the Secretary of War may from time to time prescribe in order that the tunnel shall not obstruct any improvement which the United States may make on said reservation.

SEC. 4. That the city of Seattle is further granted the right to open and perpetually maintain a public street in and along the southern, eastern, and northern boundaries of the military reservation of Fort Lawton, Wash., using for that purpose a strip of land 30 feet wide within the reservation and along said boundaries, beginning at the meander corner between sections 15 and 16, township 25 north, range 3 east, Willamette meridian; thence along the reservation boundary northerly, easterly, northerly, westerly, northerly, westerly, northerly, westerly, and northerly to the meander line on the north side of section 10 of said township and range: Provided, That all expense of opening, constructing, and maintaining said street shall be borne by said city and that the work of moving the Government fences to the location made necessary by this grant shall be done by said city without expense to the United States and to the satisfaction of the military authorities.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule a second is ordered. The gentleman from Washington is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Mississippi is entitled to twenty minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is, first, to permit the city of Seattle to construct a sewer across Fort Lawton, as is shown here on the map. The next section is to permit the city of Seattle to run its streets under the Lake Washington Canal right of way, which is represented on the map by this red line. The third purpose is to permit the city of Seattle to construct a roadway around the edge of Fort Lawton, as is shown here on the map.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. By whom is the Lake Washington Canal owned? Is it private or public?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It is owned by the Government. The purpose of running a sewer across through Fort Lawton, coming out at this point where I indicate on the map, is because of the fact that at this particular point the tide sets out at all times during the twenty-four hours. If it is not run out there, then the city will have to run it out at this point, where the tide washes up on the shore, and it would then not only endanger the health of the city of Seattle, but it would lead to the abandonment of the fort. We want to cross under the Lake Washington Canal right of way. We want to construct a tunnel for street purposes and for sewer purposes, to run our sewers and gas pipes and electric wires.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. At what depth under the canal is it proposed to have the street?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is to be regulated by agreement with the War Department. It is under their supervision and direction. I will say that the War Department has consented to this bill. In fact, all the authorities of the Government think it ought to be passed. There is a light-house at a point which I now indicate on the map, and the Light-House Board all say the bill ought to be passed. It has passed the Senate unanimously and passed the House committee unanimously.

Mr. SHERWOOD. It is a unanimous report.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The necessity for the immediate passage of the bill is that the progress of this great sewer, which represents over $4,000,000, is now being obstructed, and can not proceed until this bill is passed. There is very great urgency to protect, not only the fort itself, but to protect the health of the entire city of Seattle.

This line, representing the Lake Washington Canal, runs almost through the center of the city, and there are 100,000 people on this, the north side, and perhaps 150,000 people on this, the south side.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. What is the depth of the canal?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. It is not completed; it is a right of way.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. What safeguards have you in the bill as to the time the work will occupy, the refilling of excavations, and the restoring of the former conditions?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Nothing except that it is under the control of the Secretary of War and the fact that it has been agreed upon by all the authorities of Seattle and the Secretary of War that the bill should take this form. The tunnel is to be left open for street and other purposes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is there any safeguard as to the damages that may accrue to the canal?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is left largely with the Secretary of War, but there is a provision that if they want to proceed with the canal before the sewer is completed, then the Secretary of War may change the location at any time.

Mr. KAHN. If the canal was built it would be built under the direction of the Secretary of War?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes; this bill went through the hands of Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota, of the Committee on Military Affairs, and when I say that Members will understand that all the rights of the Government have been preserved.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. If the gentleman will allow me, I want to say that we referred this matter to Mr. STEVENS, of the Committee on Military Affairs, to Mr. YOUNG, and to a third Member, a Democrat; they went over it very thoroughly, so as to understand the matter and see exactly what it was and get the details from the Secretary of War, and they were advised that the bill in its present shape was all right.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Will the gentleman from New Jersey yield for a question?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Certainly.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Did they think it proper that this land should be given by the Government without any compensation whatever—a street 150 feet in width?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. A street 150 feet wide does not cross the Government reservation; it crosses the old Washington Canal location.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Let me explain the matter to the gentleman from New Jersey. That 150 feet width is for a tunnel 150 feet wide under the canal, to be used as a street.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. It is not over the Government reservation——

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. It is under the Government reservation.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. It is not under the Government reservation; it crosses the location of the Washington Canal.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Government does not own the property, why is the bill necessary?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The Government has a right in it as a public highway or canal.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. KAHN. Before the gentleman reserves the balance of his time, will he yield to me for one question? Is it not a fact that the entire military reservation was given by the city of Seattle to the Government without any cost?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes; we bought it and paid for it, and gave it to the Government, and we did the fort also.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the gentleman from Mississippi yield me a moment's time?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, let me simply state that in this act there are four sections. They confused me at first, and that is why we sent the bill to a subcommittee. The report by Mr. STEVENS makes it plain. Sections 1 and 4 are all that have anything to do with the military reservation. Section 1 grants the right to put a sewer right of way across the reservation, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War in all respects. The reason for the legislation is that the sewer will go into the bay at the end of the point on the reservation, and will do much less harm to the reservation than if it goes into the bay anywhere else where the sewage would more likely be cast upon the reservation.

Section 4 is a provision that a street may be run along the boundary or the reservation. It is 60 feet wide, I believe.

A MEMBER. Thirty feet wide.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Thirty feet wide, 15 feet coming off the reservation and 15 feet off of outside property. The city pays the expense of putting up the street and moving the Government fence, and the Government prefers to have the street outside.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think the gentleman from New Jersey is mistaken; I think 30 feet comes off the reservation and 30 feet off some other property.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. That is the way I had it at first; that was my recollection, but somebody interfered with my statement. Now, that is all that has to do with the fort. It seems that near the fort is a canal, as to which I am not altogether informed, but it is intended to be built, or is building, for navigation purposes, and the city of Seattle also wants to put streets under the canal, so as not to interfere with navigation.

The Government desires to encourage streets and communication by streets just as much as communication by canal, and therefore it agrees by sections 2 and 3 that these streets shall be run under the canal. If I am wrong in any of these statements, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] will correct me. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is correct.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I frankly know very little about this matter, and have called for a second chiefly to get it explained. I remember a day when I could have subscribed perfectly to the statement of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS], having carefully considered the bill, that was a very great reason to vote for it. My confidence in that gentleman's judgment upon all subjects is very exceedingly great, but his judgment has been discredited by the Republican majority and by the Speaker here lately very much, and that leads me to believe that it is a patriotic duty to my country to investigate even matters that he has passed upon. The fact that the gentleman from Minnesota is one of the enthusiastic men who have introduced a bill, and wants it passed, for free wood pulp and print paper, and that he has been discredited by not having thus far been recognized to bring that bill up under suspension of the rules, leads me to think that I perhaps ought to investigate even the legislation that he proposes to the House. I therefore, being properly warned that his name is at the head of the report and that there may be something unpatriotic or even treasonable in connection with any bill offered by any advocate of free pulp and free paper, demanded a second in order that the gentleman from Washington might explain the bill. I was a little bit afraid that perhaps it had some connection with free wood pulp and print paper, because of the identity of the name at the head of the report with that introducing the bill to put them on the free list, to which I have referred, and was a little bit afraid that we were transgressing by its consideration some of the special rules lately promulgated by the Committee on Rules to stop Democratic agitation for remedial legislation. It seems to me, however, from consideration of the bill and the report that I may justly restore the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] to my ancient and wonted confidence. It does not seem that it ought to be broken by the contents of this bill. This bill seems to be right, from all I can learn of it, and I shall be so glad to reassert my confidence in the judgment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS], who has reported it, in order that I may thereby recommend his judgment upon other subjects-matter, including free paper and pulp, that I shall later on call for the yeas and nays in order to go on record in behalf of the pending legislation. [Applause and laughter.]

There seems to be four different propositions contained in the bill, and as far as I can see there is no objection to the people of Seattle going under a canal if they want to, and having 30 feet of a military reservation added to 30 feet of their own to make a 60-foot boulevard, although they do seem to be getting it without paying anything for it. However, the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], my genial friend, who is always in favor of remedial legislation, except when the veto is put upon him by those higher in party authority, and in whom I have the utmost confidence, tells me that the reason of that is because the city of Seattle originally gave the property to the Federal Government without any compensation. This recommends the measure to me, too, Mr. Speaker. It is so seldom that from the Republican side of the Chamber there comes any justification at all for conferring special privileges upon corporations without any compensation, that when I find there is an explanation and justification consisting in the fact that the beneficiary formerly did confer upon the Federal Government some privilege without compensation, the cockles of my heart warm up to the proposed legislation, suggesting to my mind the probability of Republican conversion to some of the sound underlying principles of governmental science. [Laughter]. I am, in fact, and have been for a long time, Mr. Speaker, of the opinion that whenever the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] is let alone and left "in maiden meditation, fancy-free," to pursue the paths of legislative dalliance according to his own ideas, he is a right able legislator. But whenever he is held down under the cup of oppression, whether by the Speaker or the Committee on Rules, I find him like most men upon that side, without initiative of any description. In fact, I did think the gentleman from California would this morning have the courage to send a written petition to the Speaker of the House to recognize somebody to move to suspend the rules and discharge the Committee on Ways and Means from further consideration of a free print paper and wood pulp bill, and put it upon its passage [laughter]—not only because he is in favor of the legislation—for I understand from his general character for fairness, of course he is, as about eighty of you over there are—but because——

Mr. KAHN. Oh, the gentleman's understanding is wrong, as usual.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, in this particular case I understand my understanding is wrong. The gentleman is more subjugated than I thought. He seems to have had his opinion subjugated as well as his action. There are many over there who are in favor of it, however, and I understand that amongst them all it would be exceedingly difficult to find one who would even sign a petition—exercise the constitutional right of petition—to the Speaker to be recognized to suspend the rules and pass such a bill.

Having made these remarks in advocacy of the passage of the bill, Mr. Speaker, I shall reserve the balance of my time. [Applause.]

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TAWNEY, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 21260) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York reserves all points of order.

FORT LAWTON MILITARY RESERVATION, WASHINGTON.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Washington why the city bought this property and gave it to the Government? Was there any ulterior motive?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Just out of public-spiritedness; that is all. The Government needed a fort, so the city of Seattle bought one and gave it to the country.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Go out and see the place and the people. I have been there.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I thank the gentleman from Georgia. It is the same way about the right of way for the Lake Washington Canal. We gave that to the Government also.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, has debate been concluded on this resolution?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there any further demand for time? The question is——

EULOGIES ON SENATORS MORGAN AND PETTUS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, before the vote is taken, I have a request to make. The eulogies on Senators MORGAN and PETTUS take place this afternoon, and I have a resolution in my hand which I intend to offer, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration, but before doing that I desire to ask unanimous consent that gentlemen who may not be present to-day may insert or extend their remarks in reference to the eulogies.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that Members may extend their remarks on the subject of the eulogies on Hon. JOHN T. MORGAN and Hon. EDMUND W. PETTUS, which are to be considered this day. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolutions, which the Clerk will report.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House now proceed to pay tribute to the memory of Hon. JOHN T. MORGAN and Hon. EDMUND W. PETTUS, late Senators from the State of Alabama.

Resolved, That as a special mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Senators and in recognition of their distinguished public services, the House at the conclusion of the exercises to-day shall stand in recess until 11 o'clock and 30 minutes a. m., on Monday next.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the families of the deceased Senators.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, one word. I wish to say that owing to the peculiar situation in which we find ourselves, the occasion with which we are very soon to be confronted, that I shall not call for the yeas and nays upon this motion.

Mr. MANN. This is not a time for any partisanship, as everybody admits.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The question was taken, and the resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Clerk read the special order for to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the special order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House of Representatives shall, at 2 o'clock on Saturday, April 25, 1908, consider resolutions upon the life, character, and public services of the Hon. JOHN T. MORGAN and the Hon. EDMUND W. PETTUS, late Senators from the State of Alabama. (Resolution adopted in the House March 31, 1908.)

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. TAYLOR] take the chair?

Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama took the chair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, Alabama mourns to-day two great men, JOHN TYLER MORGAN and EDMUND WINSTON PETTUS. Like two giant oaks in the forest of statesmen, the lives of these two men have run contemporaneous with the history of Alabama. Both were born within half a decade of their State's natal day. They grew to manhood amidst the trials, hardships, and adventures of frontier life, when a great portion of Alabama was still a wilderness and before the Indian tribes were moved from the State.

Their early manhood was spent in the prosperous days of an antebellum civilization, when cotton was king and the land was new, when a man's honor was valued more than his gold, when work, honesty, and courage could obtain every opportunity in life.

From these golden days of peace and plenty, almost within the space of a flash of lightning, their lives were encompassed by the turmoils, dangers, and strifes of the civil war. Then each drew his sword in defense of the State, and for gallantry on the field of battle each returned home, when peace came again, wearing the single star, the insignia of a brigadier-general of the Confederate army.

Then came into their lives the dark, gloomy days of reconstruction, of poverty, of racial strife, of destroyed homes, of dishonored courts—the days when lawlessness reigned supreme and protection to life and property was unrecked of under the misused law of the land. It was through these terrible times that these two men stood together as pillars of strength to their neighbors in their sufferings and distress, and as pillars of light to lead their State from the sloughs of dishonor and corruption back to the high ground of honor, peace, and protection.

They lived to see their State, in their declining years, through their guidance, restored to Caucasian rule and prosperity and happiness return to the farms and cities. The development of the great mineral resources of north Alabama advanced their

State to the first rank of the manufacturing, as well as the agricultural States of the Union. They lived together for eighty-odd years. They fought together on battlefields of war and strife; on fields of law and rhetoric; in times of hardship and danger; in times of peace and plenty.

They died together, honored and loved by all their fellow-countrymen, each bearing the high commission of a United States Senator as the badge of honor conferred by a grateful people on its two most worthy citizens.

What an era to live through! What times they were to make character! How many opportunities were there for the great to rise and the weak to fall in those eighty years! Will any man ever live through such changing times again? Will Alabama again produce two such worthy sons?
